PREFACE.

IN the following pages it has been the wiſh of the Author to give the moſt accurate and ſatisfactory account of all the proper names which occur in reading the Claſſics, and, by a judicious collection of anecdotes and hiſtorical facts, to draw a picture of ancient times, not leſs inſtructive than entertaining. Such a work, it is hoped, will not be deemed an uſeleſs acquiſition in the hands of the public, and while the ſtudent is initiated in the knowledge of hiſtory and mythology, and familiarized with the ancient ſituation and extent of kingdoms and cities that no longer exiſt, the man of letters may, perhaps, find it not a contemptible companion, from which he may receive information, and be made, a ſecond time, acquainted with many important particulars which time, or more laborious occupations, may have erazed from his memory. In the proſecution of his plan, the author has been obliged to tread in the ſteps of many learned men, whoſe ſtudies have been directed, and not without ſucceſs, to facilitate the attainment of claſſical knowledge, and the ancient languages. Their compoſitions have been to him a ſource of information, and he truſts that their labors have now found new elucidation in his own, and that, by a due conſideration of every ſubject, he has been enabled to imitate their excellencies, without copying their faults. Many compoſitions of the ſame nature have iſſued from the preſs, but they are partial and unſatisfactory. The attempts to be conciſe, have rendered the labors of one barren and uninſtructive, while long and unconnected quotations of paſſages, from Greek and Latin writers, diſfigure the page of the other, and render the whole inſipid and diſguſting. It cannot, therefore, be a diſcouraging employment now, to endeavour to finiſh what others have left imperfect, and, with the conciſeneſs of Stephens, to add the diffuſe reſearches of Lloyd, Hoffman, Collier, &c. After paying due attention to the ancient poets and hiſtorians, from whom the moſt authentic information can be received, the labors of more modern authors have been conſulted, and every compoſition, diſtinguiſhed for the clearneſs and perſpicuity of hiſtorical narration, or geographical deſcriptions, has been carefully examined. Truly ſenſible of what he owes to modern Latin and Engliſh writers and commentators, the author muſt not forget to make a public acknowledgment of the aſſiſtance he has likewiſe received from the labors of the French. IN the following pages it has been the wiſh of the Author to give the moſt accurate and ſatisfactory account of all the proper names which occur in reading the Claſſics, and, by a judicious collection of anecdotes and hiſtorical facts, to draw a picture of ancient times, not leſs inſtructive than entertaining. Such a work, it is hoped, will not be deemed an uſeleſs acquiſition in the hands of the public, and while the ſtudent is initiated in the knowledge of hiſtory and mythology, and familiarized with the ancient ſituation and extent of kingdoms and cities that no longer exiſt, the man of letters may, perhaps, find it not a contemptible companion, from which he may receive information, and be made, a ſecond time, acquainted with many important particulars which time, or more laborious occupations, may have erazed from his memory. In the proſecution of his plan, the author has been obliged to tread in the ſteps of many learned men, whoſe ſtudies have been directed, and not without ſucceſs, to facilitate the attainment of claſſical knowledge, and the ancient languages. Their compoſitions have been to him a ſource of information, and he truſts that their labors have now found new elucidation in his own, and that, by a due conſideration of every ſubject, he has been enabled to imitate their excellencies, without copying their faults. Many compoſitions of the ſame nature have iſſued from the preſs, but they are partial and unſatisfactory. The attempts to be conciſe, have rendered the labors of one barren and uninſtructive, while long and unconnected quotations of paſſages, from Greek and Latin writers, diſfigure the page of the other, and render the whole inſipid and diſguſting. It cannot, therefore, be a diſcouraging employment now, to endeavour to finiſh what others have left imperfect, and, with the conciſeneſs of Stephens, to add the diffuſe reſearches of Lloyd, Hoffman, Collier, &c. After paying due attention to the ancient poets and hiſtorians, from whom the moſt authentic information can be received, the labors of more modern authors have been conſulted, and every compoſition, diſtinguiſhed for the clearneſs and perſpicuity of hiſtorical narration, or geographical deſcriptions, has been carefully examined. Truly ſenſible of what he owes to modern Latin and Engliſh writers and commentators, the author muſt not forget to make a public acknowledgment of the aſſiſtance he has likewiſe received from the labors of the French. In the Siecles Payens of l'Abbé Sabatier de Caſtres, he has found all the information which judicious criticiſm, and a perfect knowledge of heathen mythology, could procure. The compoſitions of l'Abbé Baniet, have alſo been uſeful, and in the Dictionaire Hiſtorique, of a literary ſociety, printed at Caen, a treaſure of original anecdotes, and a candid ſelection and arrangement of hiſtorical facts have been diſcovered.

It was the original deſign of the author of this Dictionary, to give a minute explanation of all the names of which Pliny, and other ancient geographers, make mention; but, upon a ſecond conſideration of the ſubject, he was convinced, that it would have increaſed his volume in bulk, and not in value. The learned reader will be ſenſible of the propriety of this remark, when he recollects, that the names of many places mentioned by Pliny and Pauſanias, occur no where elſe in ancient authors, and that to find the true ſituation of an inſignificant village, mentioned by Strabo, no other writer but Strabo is to be conſulted.

This Dictionary being undertaken more particularly for the uſe of ſchools, it has been thought proper to mark the quantity of the penultimate of every word, and to aſſiſt the ſtudent who can receive no fixed and poſitive rules for pronunciation. In this the authority of Smethius has been followed, as alſo Leedes's edition of Labbe's Catholici Indices.

As every publication ſhould be calculated to facilitate literature, and to be ſerviceable to the advancement of the ſciences, the author of this Dictionary did not preſume to intrude himſelf upon the public, before he was ſenſible that his humble labors would be of ſome ſervice to the lovers of the ancient languages. The undertaking was for the uſe of ſchools, therefore he thought none ſo capable of judging of its merit, and of aſcertaining its utility, as thoſe who preſide over the education of youth. With this view, he took the liberty to communicate his intentions to ſeveral gentlemen in that line, not leſs diſtinguiſhed for purity of criticiſm, than for their claſſical abilities, and from them he received all the encouragement which the deſire of contributing to the advancement of learning can expect. To them, therefore, for their approbation and friendly communications, he publicly returns his thanks, and hopes, that, now his labors are completed, his Dictionary may claim from them that patronage, and that ſupport, to which, in their opinion, the ſpecimen of the work ſeemed to be entitled. He has paid due attention to their remarks, he has received with gratitude their judicious obſervations, and cannot paſs over in ſilence their obliging recommendations, and particularly the friendly advice he has received from the Rev. R. Valpy, Maſter of Reading ſchool.

For the account of the Roman laws, and for the feſtivals celebrated by the ancient inhabitants of Greece and Italy, he is particularly indebted to the uſeful collections of Archbiſhop Potter, of Godwin, and Kennet. In the tables of ancient coins, weights, and meaſures, which he has annexed to the body of the Dictionary, he has followed the learned calculations of Dr. Arbuthnot. The quoted authorities have been carefully examined, and frequently reviſed, and, it is hoped, the opinions of mythologiſts will appear without confuſion, and be found diveſted of all obſcurity.

Therefore, with all the confidence which an earneſt deſire of being uſeful can command, the author offers the following pages to be public, conſcious that they may contain inaccuracies and imperfections. A Dictionary, the candid reader is well aware, cannot be made perfect all at once; it muſt ſtill have its faults and omiſſions, however cautious and vigilant the author may have been, and in every page there may be found, in the opinion of ſome, room for improvement, and for addition. Before the candid, therefore, and the impartial, he lays his publication, and for whatever obſervations the friendly critic may make, he will ſhew himſelf grateful, and take advantage of the remarks of every judicious reader, ſhould the favors and the indulgence of the public demand a ſecond edition.

PEMBROKE COLLEGE, OXFORD,
NOVEMBER, 1788.

THE very favorable reception which the firſt edition of the Claſſical Dictionary has met from the public, fully evinces the utility of the performance. From the conſciouſneſs of this, the author has ſpared no pains to render this ſecond edition more deſerving of the ſame liberal patronage. The hints of friends, and the animadverſions of critics, have been carefully adopted, and almoſt every article has been corrected and improved. New names have not only been introduced, but the date of events has been more exactly aſcertained, and, therefore, to ſuch as compare the two editions, the improvements will appear numerous and important in every page.

In anſwer to thoſe Gentlemen who have objected againſt the ſmallneſs of the print, and have recommended a larger type, the author begs leave to obſerve, that it has been found impracticable to remove the inconvenience: ſo much matter could not well have been compreſſed in one octavo; and it muſt be remembered, that the book is intended as a volume of occaſional reference, and, therefore, that it cannot long fatigue the eye.

It will be found not an unneceſſary addition, to have an account of the beſt editions of each claſſic at the end of the reſpective character of the authors. Dr. Harwood's plan has in general been attended to, but the price has not been inſerted from its great fluctuation, which often depends more upon the caprice of opinion than upon real value.

The chronological table preſixed to the Dictionary will, it is hoped, be acknowledged univerſally uſeful. It has been compiled with great accuracy, and chiefly extracted from "The Chronology and Hiſtory of the World, by Dr. J. Blair, folio edition, 1754;" and from Archbiſhop Uſher's "Annales Veteris et Novi Teſtamenti," printed at Geneva, folio, 1722.

* In the following table, I have confined myſelf to the more eaſy and convenient eras of before, (B.C.) and after, (A.D.) Chriſt. For the ſake of thoſe, however, that do not wiſh the excluſion of the Julian period, it is neceſſary to obſerve, that, as the firſt year of the Chriſtian era always falls on the 4714th of the Julian years, the number required either before or after Chriſt, will eaſily be diſcovered by the application of the rules of ſubſtraction or addition. The era from the foundation of Rome (A.U.C.) will be found with the ſame facility, by recollecting that the city was buit 753 years before Chriſt; and the Olympiads can likewiſe be recurred to by the conſideration, that the conqueſt of Coroebus (B.C. 776.) forms the firſt Olympiad, and that the Olympic games were celebrated after the revolution of four years.

Achæa, a ſirname of Pallas, whoſe temple in Daunia was defended by dogs, who fawned upon the Greeks, but fiercely attacked all other perſons. Ariſtot. de Mirab.—Ceres was called Achæa, from her lamentations at the loſs of Proſerpine. Plut. in Iſid. & Oſir.

Achæi, the deſcendants of Achæus, at firſt inhabited the country near Argos, but being driven by the Heraclidæ 80 years after the Trojan war, they retired among the Ionians, whoſe 12 cities they ſeized and kept. The names of theſe cities are Pelena, Ægira, Æges, Bura, Tritæa, Ægion, Rhypæ, Olenos, Helice, Patræ, Dyme, and Pharæ. The inhabitants of theſe three laſt began a famous confederacy, 284 years B. C. which continued formidable upwards of 130 years, under the name of the Achæan league. Their arms were directed againſt the Ætolians for three years, with the aſſiſtance of Philip of Macedon, and they grew powerful by the conjunction of neighbouring ſtates, and freed their country from foreign ſlavery, till at laſt they were attacked by the Romans, and, after one year's hoſtilities, the Achæan league was totally deſtroyed, B. C. 147. The Achæans extended the borders of their country by conqueſt, and even planted colonies in Magna Græcia.—The name of Achæi is generally applied to all the Greeks indiſcriminately, by the poets. Vid. Achaia. Herodot. 1, c. 145, l. 8, c. 36.—*Stat. Achelorium, a river of Theſſaly. Polyæn. 8.

Achelōus, the ſon of Oceanus & Terra or Tethys, god of the river of the ſame name in Epirus. As one of the numerous ſuitors of Dejanira, daughter of Œneus, he entered the liſts againſt Hercules, and being inferior, changed himſelf into a ſerpent, and afterwards into an ox. Hercules broke off one of his horns, and Achelous being defeated, retired into his bed of waters. The broken horn was given to the goddeſs of Plenty. Some ſay that he was changed into a river after the victory of Hercules. This river is in Epirus. It riſes in mount Pindus, and divides Acarnania from Ætolia, and falls into the Ionian ſea. The ſand and mud which it carries down, have formed ſome iſlands at its mouth. This river is ſaid by ſome to have ſprung from the earth after the deluge. Herodot. 2, c. 10.—Strab. 10.—*Ovid. Acherdus, a tribe of Attica; hence Acherduſius. Demoſth.

Acherīmi, a people of Sicily. Cic. 3 in Terr.

Achĕron, a river of Theſprotia, in Epirus. Homer called it, from the dead appearance of its waters, one of the rivers of hell, and the fable has been adopted by all ſucceeding poets, who make the god of the ſtream to be the ſon of Ceres without a father, and ſay that he concealed himſelf in hell for fear of the Titans, and was changed into a bitter ſtream, over which the ſouls of the dead are at firſt conveyed. It receives, ſay they, the ſouls of the dead, becauſe a deadly languor ſeizes them at the hour of diſſolution. Some make him ſon of Titan, and ſuppoſe that he was plunged into hell by Jupiter, for ſupplying the Titans with water. The word Acheron is often taken for hell itſelf. Horat. 1, od. 3, v. 36. Virg. G. 2, v. 492. Æn. 2, v. 295, &c. — Strab. 7. — Lucan 3, v. 16.—Sil. 2 Silv. 6, v. 80.—Liv. 8, c. 24.——A river of Elis in Peloponneſus.——Another on the Riphæan mountains. Orpheus.——Alſo a river in the country of the Brutii in Italy. Juſtin 12, c. 2.

Achilleienses, a people near Macedonia. Xenoph. Hiſt. Græc. 3.

Achillēis, a poem of Statius, in which he deſcribes the education and memorable actions of Achilles. This compoſition is imperfect. The poet's immature death deprived the world of a valuable hiſtory of the life and exploits of this famous hero.

Achilles, the ſon of Peleus and Thetis, was the braveſt of all the Greeks in the Trojan war. During his infancy, Thetis plunged him in the Styx, and made every part of his body invulnerable, except the heel, by which ſhe held him. His education was entruſted to the centaur Chiron, who taught him the art of war, and made him maſter of muſic, and, by feeding him with the marrow of wild beaſts, rendered him vigorous and active. He was taught eloquence by Phœnix, whom he ever after loved and reſpected. Thetis, to prevent him from going to the Trojan war, where ſhe knew he was to periſh, privately ſent him to the court of Lycomedes, where he was diſguiſed in a female dreſs, and, by his familiarity with the king's daughters, made Deidamia mother of Neoptolemus. As Troy could not be taken without the aid of Achilles, Ulyſſes went to the court of Lycomedes in the habit of a merchant, and expoſed jewels and arms to ſale. Achilles, chuſing the arms, diſcovered his ſex, and went to war. Vulcan, at the entreaties of Thetis, made him a ſtrong armour, which was proof againſt all weapons. He was deprived by Agamemnon of his favorite miſtreſs, Briſeis, who had fallen to his lot at the diviſion of the booty of Lyrneſſus. For this affront, he refuſed to appear in the field till the death of his friend Patroclus recalled him to action, and to revenge. [Vid. Patroclus.] He ſlew Hector, the bulwark of Troy, tied the corpſe by the heels to his chariot, and dragged it three times round the walls of Troy. After thus appeaſing the ſhades of his friend, he permitted old Priam to carry away Hector's body. In the 10th year of the war, Achilles was charmed with Polyxena; and as he ſolicited her hand in the temple of Minerva, it is ſaid that Paris aimed an arrow at his vulnerable heel, of which wound he died. His body was buried at Sigæum, and divine honors were paid to him, and temples raiſed to his memory. It is ſaid, that after the taking of Troy, the ghoſt of Achilles appeared to the Greeks, and demanded of them Polyxena, who accordingly was ſacrificed on his tomb by his ſon Neoptolemus. Some ſay that this ſacrifice was voluntary, and that Polyxena was ſo grieved at his death that ſhe killed herſelf on his tomb. The Theſſalians yearly ſacrificed a black and a white bull on his tomb. It is reported that he married Helen after the ſiege of Troy; and others maintain, that this marriage happened after his death, in the iſland of Leuce, where many of the ancient heroes lived, as in a ſeparate elyſium. [Vid. Leuce.] When Achilles was young, his mother aſked him, whether he preferred a long life, ſpent in obſcurity and retirement, to a few years of military fame and glory? and that, to his honor, he made choice of the latter. Some ages after the Trojan war, Alexander, going to the conqueſt of Perſia, offered ſacrifices on the tomb of Achilles, and admired the hero who had found a Homer to publiſh his fame to poſterity. *Xenoph. de venat.—Plut. in Alex. Acrisioniădes, a patronymic of Perseus, from his grandfather Acrisius. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 70.

Acrisius, son of Abas, king of Argos, by Ocalea, daughter of Mantineus. He was born at the same birth as Prœtus, with whom it is said that he quarrelled even in his mother's womb. After many dissensions, Prœtus was driven from Argos. Acrisius had Danae by Eurydice daughter of Lacedæmon; and being told by an oracle, that his daughter's son would put him to death, he confined Danae in a brazen tower, to prevent her becoming a mother. She however became pregnant, by Jupiter changed into a golden shower; and tho' Acrisius ordered her, and her infant called Perseus, to be exposed on the sea, yet they were saved; and Perseus soon after became so famous for his actions, that Acrisius, anxious to see so renowned a grandson, went to Larissa. Here Perseus, wishing to shew his skill in throwing a quoit, killed an old man who proved to be his grandfather, whom he knew not. In that, therefore, the oracle was fulfilled. Acrisius reigned about 31 years. Hygin. fab. 63.—Ovid. Met. 4. fab. 16.—Horat. 3, od. 16.—Apollod. 2, c. 2, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 16, &c.—Vid. Danae, Perseus, Polydectes.

Ades,

ADES, or HADES, the god of hell among the Greeks, the ſame as the Pluto of the Latins. The word is derived from α & ιδειν, [non videre] becauſe hell is deprived of light. It is often uſed for hell itſelf by the ancient poets.

ADGANDESTRIUS, a prince of Gaul, who ſent to Rome for poiſon to deſtroy Arminius, and was anſwered by the ſenate, that the Romans fought their enemies openly, and never uſed perfidious meaſures. Tacit. An. 2, c. 88.

ADHERBAL, ſon of Micipſa, and grandſon of Maſiniſſa, was beſieged at Cirta, and put to death by Jugurtha, after vainly imploring the aid of Rome. B. C. 112. Salluſt. in Jug.

ADHERBAS, the huſband of Dido. Vid. Sichæus.

ADIANTE, a daughter of Danaus. Apollod. 2, c. 11.

ADIATORIX, a governor of Galatia, who, to gain Antony's favor, ſlaughtered in one night, all the inhabitants of the Roman colony of Heraclea, in Pontus. He was taken at Actium, led in triumph by Auguſtus, and ſtrangled in priſon. Strab. 12.

ADIMANTUS, a commander of the Athenian fleet, taken by the Spartans. All the men of the fleet were put to death, except Adimantus, becauſe he had oppoſed the deſigns of his countrymen, who intended to mutilate all the Spartans, Xenoph. Hiſt. Græc. Pauſanias ſays, 4, c. 17, l. 10, c. 9. that the Spartans had bribed him.—A brother of Plato. Laert. 3.—A Corinthian general, who reproached Themiſtocles with his exile.—A king ſtruck with thunder, for ſaying that Jupiter deſerved no ſacrifices. Ovid in Ibin. 337.

ADMETA, daughter of Euryſtheus, was prieſteſs of Juno's temple at Argos.——One of the Oceanides. Heſiod. Theog. v. 349.

ADMETUS, ſon of Pheres and Clymene, king of Pheræ in Theſſaly, married Theone daughter of Theſtor, and after her death, Alceſte daughter of Pelias. Apollo, when baniſhed from heaven, is ſaid to have tended his flocks for nine years, and to have obtained from the Parcæ, that Admetus ſhould never die, if another perſon laid down his life for him. This was chearfully done by Alceſte.—Admetus was one of the Argonauts, and was at the hunt of the Calydonian boar. Pelias promiſed his daughter in marriage only to him who could bring him a chariot drawn by a lion and a wild boar. Admetus did this by the aid of Apollo, and obtained Alceſte in marriage. Some ſay that Hercules brought him back Alceſte from hell. Senec. in Medea.—Hygin. fab. 50, 51, & 243.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 3.—Apollod. 1, c. 8 & 9, &c.—Tibull. 2 el. 3.—Pauſ. 5, c. 17.——A king of the Moloſſi, to whom Themiſtocles fled for protection. C. Nep. in Them. 8.——An officer of Alexander, killed at the ſiege of Tyre. Diod. 17.

ADONIA, feſtivals in honor of Adonis, firſt celebrated at Byblos in Phœnicia. They laſted two days, the firſt of which was ſpent in howlings and lamentations, the ſecond in joyful clamors, as if Adonis was returned to life. In ſome towns of Greece and Egypt they laſted eight days. Only women were admitted, and ſuch as did not appear were compelled to proſtitute themſelves for one day. The time of the celebration was ſuppoſed to be very unlucky. The fleet of Nicias ſailed from Athens to Sicily on that day, whence many unfortunate omens were drawn. Plut. in Nicia.—Ammian. 22, c. 9.

ADONIS, ſon of Cinyras, by his daughter Myrrha, [vid. Myrrha] was the favorite of Venus. He was fond of hunting, and was often cautioned by his miſtreſs not to hunt wild beaſts, for fear of being killed in the attempt. This advice he ſlighted, and at laſt received a mortal bite from a wild boar which he had wounded, and Venus, after ſhedding many tears at his death, changed him into a flower called anemony. Proſerpine is ſaid to have reſtored him to life, on condition that he ſhould ſpend ſix months with her, and the reſt of the year with Venus. This implies the alternate return of ſummer and winter. Adonis is often taken for Oſiris, becauſe the feſtivals of both were often begun with mournful lamentations, and finiſhed with a revival of joy, as if they were returning to life again.—Adonis had temples raiſed to his memory, and is ſaid by ſome to have been beloved by Apollo and Bacchus. —Apollod. 3, c. 14.—Propert. 2, el. 13, v. 53.—Virg. Ecl. 10, v. 18.—Bion. in Adon.—Hygin. 58, 164, 248, &c.—Ovid. Met. 10, fab. 10.—Muſæus de Her.—Pauſ. 2, c. 20, l. 9, c. 41.——A river of Phœnicia.

ADRAMYTTIUM, an Athenian colony on the ſea coaſt of Myſia, near the Caycus. Strab. 13.—Thucyd. 5, c. 1.

ADRANA, a river in Germany. Tac. Ann. 1, c. 56.

ADRANUM, a town of Sicily near Ætna, with a river of the ſame name. The chief deity of the place is called Adranus. His temple was guarded by 1000 dogs. Plut. in Timol.

ADRASTIA, a fountain of Sicyon. Pauſ. 2, c. 15.——A mountain. Plut. in Lucul.——A country near Troy, called after Adraſtus, who built there a temple to Nemeſis. Here Apollo had an oracle. Strab. 13.——A daughter of Jupiter and Neceſſity. She is called by ſome Nemeſis, and is the puniſher punisher of injustice. The Egyptians placed her above the moon, whence she looked down upon the actions of men. Strab. 13.—A daughter of Melisseus, to whom some attribute the nursing of Jupiter. Apol. 1, c. 1.

Adrastii Campi, a plain near the Granicus, where Alexander first defeated Darius. Justin. 11, c. 6.

Adrastus, son of Talaus and Lysimache, was king of Argos. Polynices being banished from Thebes by his brother Eteocles, fled to Argos, where he married Argia, daughter of Adrastus. The king assisted his son-in-law, and marched against Thebes with an army headed by seven of his most famous generals. All perished in the war except Adrastus, who, with a few men saved from slaughter, fled to Athens, and implored the aid of Theseus against the Thebans, who opposed the burying of the Argives slain in battle. Theseus went to his assistance, and was victorious.—Adrastus, after a long reign, died through grief, occasioned by the death of his son Ægialeus. A temple was raised to his memory at Sicyon. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 480.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 7.—Stat. Theb. 4 & 5.—Hygin. fab. 68, 69, & 70.—Paus. 1, c. 39, l. 8, c. 25, l. 10, c. 90.—Herodot. 5, c. 67, &c.——A peripatetic philosopher, disciple to Aristotle. It is supposed that a copy of his treatise on harmonics is preserved in the Vatican.——A Phrygian prince, who having inadvertently killed his brother, fled to Crœsus, where he was humanely received, and entrusted with the care of his son Atys. In hunting a wild boar, Adrastus slew the young prince, and in his despair killed himself on his grave. Herodot. 1, c. 35, &c.——A Lydian, who assisted the Greeks against the Persians. Paus. 7, c. 5.——A soothsayer in the Trojan war. Homer Il. 2 & 6.——The father of Eurydice, who married Ilus the Trojan. Apollod. 2, c. 12.—A king of Sicyon, who reigned 4 years B. C. 1215.——A son of Hercules. Hygin. 242.

Adria, Adriānum, or Adriaticum mare, a sea lying between Illyricum and Italy, now called the gulph of Venice, first made known to the Greeks by the discoveries of the Phocæans. Herodot. 1.—Horat. 1, od. 33, l. 3. od. 3 and 9.

Adrianopŏlis, a town of Thrace on the Hebrus.—Another in Ætolia,—Pisidia, and Bithynia.

Adriānus, the 15th emperor of Rome, He is represented as an active, learned, warlike and austere general. He came to Britain, where he built a wall between the modern towns of Carlisle and Newcastle 60 miles long, to protect the Britons from the incursions of the Caledonians. He killed in battle 500,000 Jews who had rebelled, and built a city on the ruins of Jerusalem, which he called Ælia. His memory was so retentive, that he remembered every incident of his life, and knew all the soldiers of his army by name. He was the first emperor who wore a long beard, and this he did to hide the warts on his face. His successors followed his example, not through necessity, but for ornament. He went always bare-headed, and in long marches always travelled on foot. In the beginning of his reign, he followed the virtues of his adopted father and predecessor Trajan; he remitted all arrears due to his treasury for 16 years, and publicly burnt the account-books, that his word might not be suspected. His peace with the Parthians proceeded from a wish of punishing the other enemies of Rome, more than from the effects of fear. The travels of Adrian were not for the display of imperial pride, but to see whether justice was distributed impartially; and public favor was courted by a condescending behaviour, and the meaner familiarity of bathing with the common people. It is said that he wished to enrol Christ among the gods of Rome; but his apparent lenity towards the Christians was disproved, by the erection of a statue to Jupiter on the spot where Jesus rose from the dead, and one to Venus on mount Calvary. The weight of diseases become intolerable. Adrian attempted to destroy himself; and when prevented, he exclaimed, that the lives of others were in his hands, but not his own. He wrote an account of his life, and published it under the name of one of his domestics. He died of a dysentery at Baiæ, July 10. A. D. 138, in the 72d year of his age, after a reign of 21 years. Dio.——An officer of Lucullus. Plut. in Luc.——A rhetorician of Tyre in the age of M. Antonibus, who wrote seven books of metamorphoses, besides other treatises now lost.

Adrimētum, a town of Africa, on the Mediterranean, built by the Phœnicians. Sallust. in Jug.

Adyrmachīdæ, a maritime people of Africa, near Egypt. Herodot. 4, c. 168.

Æa, a huntress changed into an island of the same name by the gods, to rescue her from the pursuit of her lover, the river Phasis. It had a town called Æa, which was the capital of Colchis. Flacc. 5, v. 426.—— A town of Thessaly.—Of Africa.—A fountain of Macedonia near Amydon.

Æacēa, games at Ægina, in honor of Æacus.

Æacīdas, a king of Epirus, son of Neoptolemus, and brother to Olympias. He was expelled by his subjects for his continual wars with Macedonia. He left a son, Pyrrhus, only two years old, whom Chaucus Chaucus king of Illyricum educated. Pauſ. 1, c. 11.

Æacĭdes, a patronymic of the deſcendants of Æacus, ſuch as Achilles, Peleus, Pyrrhus, &c. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 103, &c.

Æacus, ſon of Jupiter by Ægina daughter of Aſopus, was king of the iſland of Œnopia, which he called by his mother's name. A peſtilence having deſtroyed all his ſubjects, he entreated Jupiter to re-people his kingdom; and according to his deſire, all the ants which were in an old oak were changed into men, and called by Æacus myrmidons, from μυρμηξ, an ant.—Æacus married Endeis, by whom he had Telamon and Peleus. He afterwards had Phocus by Pſamathe, one of the Nereids. He was a man of ſuch integrity that the ancients have made him one of the judges of hell, with Minos and Rhadamanthus. Horat. 2, od. 13, l. 4, od. 8.—Pauſ. 1, c. 44. l. 2, c. 29.—Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 25, l. 13, v. 25.—Propert. 4, el. 12.—Plut. de conſol. ad Apoll.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.

Ææ, Æa, or Ææa, an iſland of Colchis, in the Phaſis. Apoilon. 3.

Ææa, a name given to Circe, becauſe born at Ææ. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 386.

Æantĭdes, a tyrant of Lampſacus, intimate with Darius. He married a daughter of Hippias, tyrant of Athens. Thucyd. 6, c. 59.—One of the 7 poets, called Pleiades.

Æantis, an Athenian tribe. Plut. Symp. 2.

Æas, a river of Epirus, falling into the Ionian ſea. In the fable of Io, Ovid deſcribes it as falling into the Peneus, and meeting other rivers at Tempe. This ſome have ſuppoſed to be a geographical miſtake of the poet. Lucan 6, v. 261.—Ovid Met. 1, v. 552.

Æatus, ſon of Philip, and brother of Polyclea, was deſcended from Hercules. An oracle having ſaid that whoever of the two touched the land after croſſing the Achelous ſhould obtain the kingdom, Polyclea pretended to be lame, and prevailed upon her brother to carry her acroſs on his ſhoulders. When they came near the oppoſite ſide, Polyclea leaped aſhore from her brother's back, exclaiming that the kingdom was her own. Æatus joined her in her exclamation, and afterwards married her, and reigned conjointly with her. Their ſon Theſſalus gave his name to Theſſaly. Polyæn. 8.

Æchmacĕras, a ſon of Hercules, by Phyllone, daughter of Alcimedon. When the father heard that his daughter had had a child, he expoſed her and the infant in the woods to wild beaſts, where Hercules, conducted by the noiſe of a magpye which imitated the cries of a child, found and delivered them. Pauſ. 8. c. 12.

Æchmis, ſucceeded his father Polymneſtor on the throne of Arcadia, in the reign of Theopompus of Sparta. Pauſ. 8, c. 5.

Ædepsum, a town of Eubœa. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Strab. 10.

Ædessa, or Edeſſa, a town near Pella. Ceranus king of Macedonia took it by following goats that ſought ſhelter from the rain, and called it, from that circumſtance, Ægeas. It was the burying-place of the Macedonian kings; and an oracle had ſaid, that as long as the kings were buried there, ſo long would their kingdom ſubſiſt. Alexander was buried in a different place; and on that account, ſome authors have ſaid that the kingdom became extinct. Juſtin 7, c. 1.

Ædicŭla Ridiculi, a temple raiſed to the god of mirth, from the following circumſtance: after the battle of Cannæ, Hannibal marched to Rome, whence he was driven back by the inclemency of the weather; which cauſed ſo much joy in Rome, that the Romans raiſed a temple to the god of mirth. This deity was worſhipped at Sparta. Plut. in Lyc. Agid. & Cleom.—Pauſanias alſo mentions a θεος γελωτος.

Ædiles, Roman magiſtrates, that had the care of all buildings, baths and aqueducts, and examined the weights and meaſures, that nothing might be ſold without its due value. There were three different ſorts; the Ædiles Plebeii, or Minores; the Majores Ædiles, and the Ædiles Cereales.—The plebeian ediles were two, firſt created with the tribunes; they preſided over the more minute affairs of the ſtate, good order, and the reparation of the ſtreets. They procured all the proviſions of the city, and executed the decrees of the people. The Majores and Cereales had greater privileges, though they at firſt ſhared in the labor of the plebeian ediles; they appeared with more pomp, and were allowed to ſit publicly in ivory chairs. The office of an edile was honorable, and was always the primary ſtep to greater honors in the republic. The ediles were choſen from the plebeians for 127 years, till A. U. C. 338. Varro. de L. L. 4. c. 14.—Cic. Legib. 3.

Ædipsus, a town in Eubœa.

Ædon, daughter of Pandarus, married Zethus brother to Amphion, by whom ſhe had a ſon called Itylus. She was ſo jealous of her ſiſter Niobe, becauſe ſhe had more children than herſelf, that ſhe reſolved to murder the elder, who was educated with Itylus. She by miſtake killed her own ſon, and was changed into a nightingale as ſhe attempted to kill herſelf. Homer. Od. 19.

Æduı, or Hedui, a powerful nation of Celtic Celtic Gaul, which for a long time maintained a war againſt J. Cæſar. Cæſ. de bell. Gall.

ÆETA, or Æetes king of Colchis, ſon of Sol, and Perſeis daughter of Oceanus, was father of Medea, Abſyrtus and Chalciope, by Idya, one of the Oceanides. He killed Phryxus ſon of Athamas, who had fled to his court on a golden ram. This murder he committed to obtain the fleece of the golden ram. The Argonauts came againſt Colchis, and recovered the golden fleece by means of Medea, though it was guarded by bulls that breathed fire, and by a venomous dragon. Their expedition has been celebrated by all the ancient poets. [Vid. Jaſon, Medea, and Phryxus.] Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 1, &c.—Pauſ. 2, c. 3.—Juſtin 42, c. 2.—Flacc. & Orpheus in Argon.

ÆGA, an iſland of the Ægean ſea between Tenedos and Chios.

ÆGÆAS, a town, whoſe inhabitants are called Ægeates. [Vid. Ædeſſa.]

ÆGÆ, a city of Macedonia, the ſame as Edeſſa. Some writers make them different, but Juſtin proves this to be erroneous, 7, c. 1.—Plin. 4, c. 10.——A town of Eubœa, whence Neptune is called Ægæus. Strab. 9, ÆGÆÆ, a town and ſea-port of Cilicia. Lucan. 3, v. 227.

ÆGÆON, one of Lycaon's 50 ſons. Apollod. 3, c. 8.——The ſon of Cœlus, or of Pontus and Terra. He is the ſame as Briareus. [Vid. Briareus.] It is ſuppoſed that he was a notorious pirate chiefly reſiding at Æga, whence his name; and that the fable about his 100 hands ariſes from his having 100 men to manage his oars in his piratical excurſions. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 565.

ÆGÆUM MARE, (now Archipelago) part of the Mediterranean, dividing Greece from Aſia Minor. It is full of iſlands, ſome of which are called Cyclades, others Sporades, &c. The word Ægeum is derived by ſome from Ægæ, a town of Eubœa; or from the number of iſlands which it contains, that appear above the ſea, as αιγες, goats; or from Ægeus, who is ſuppoſed to have drowned himſelf in it. Plin. 4, c. 11.—Strab. 7.

ÆGÆUS, a ſirname of Neptune, from Ægæ in Eubœa. Strab. 9.——A river of Corcyra.——A plain in Phocis.

ÆGESTA, the daughter of Hippotes, and mother of Ægeſtus called Aceſtes. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 554.——An ancient town of Sicily near mount Eryx, deſtroyed by Agathocles. Diod. 10.

ÆGEUS, king of Athens, ſon of Pandion, being deſirous of having children, went to conſult the oracle, and in his return, ſtopped at the court of Pittheus king of Troezene, who gave him his daughter Æthra in marriage. He left her pregnant, and told her, if ſhe had a ſon, to ſend him to Athens as ſoon as he could lift a ſtone under which he had concealed his ſword. By this ſword he was to be known to Ægeus, who did not wiſh to make any public diſcovery of a ſon, for fear of his nephews, the Pallantides, who expected his crown. Æthra became mother of Theſeus, whom ſhe accordingly ſent to Athens with his father's ſword. At that time Ægeus lived with Medea, the divorced wife of Jaſon. When Theſeus came to Athens, Medea attempted to poiſon him; but he eſcaped, and upon ſhewing Ægeus the ſword he wore, diſcovered himſelf to be his ſon. When Theſeus returned from Crete after the death of the Minotaur, he forgot to hoiſt up white ſails as a ſignal of his ſucceſs; and Ægeus, at the ſight of black ſails, concluding that his ſon was dead, threw himſelf from a high rock into the ſea; which, from him, as ſome ſuppoſe, has been called the Ægean. Ægeus reigned 48 years, and died B. C. 1235. [Vid. Theſeus, Minotaurus and Medea.] Apollod. 1, c. 8, 9. l. 3, c. 15.—Pauſ. 1, c. 5, 22, 38. l. 4, c. 2.—Plut. in Theſ.—Hygin. fab. 37 & 43.

ÆGIALE, one of Phaeton's ſiſters changed into poplars, and their tears into amber. They are called Heliades.——A daughter of Adraſtus, by Amphitea daughter of Pronax. She married Diomedes, in whoſe abſence, during the Trojan war, ſhe proſtituted herſelf to her ſervants, and chiefly to Cometes, whom the king had left maſter of his houſe. At his return, Diomedes being told of his wife's wantonneſs, went to ſettle in Daunia. Some ſay that Venus implanted thoſe vicious and luſtful propenſities in Ægiale, to revenge herſelf on Diomedes, who had wounded her in the Trojan war. Ovid in Ib. v. 350.—Homer Il. 5, v. 412.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.——Stat. 3, Silv. 5, v. 48.

ÆGILIA, an iſland between Crete and Peloponneſus.—A place in Eubœa. Herodot. 6, c. 101.

ÆGIMIUS, an old man who lived, according to Anacreon, 200 years. Plin. 7. c. 48.——A king of Doris, whom Hercules aſſiſted to conquer the Lapithæ. Apolled. 2, c. 7.

ÆGIMŌRUS or ÆGIMŪRUS, an iſland near Libya. Liv. 29, c. 27.

ÆGĪNA, daughter of Aſopus, had Æacus by Jupiter changed into a flame of fire. She afterwards married Actor, ſon of Myrmidon, by whom ſhe had ſome children, who conſpired againſt their father. Some ſay that ſhe was changed by Jupiter into the iſland which bears her name. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Strab. 8.—Mela 2, c. 7.—Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 3, c. 12.—Pauſ. 2, c. 5 & 29.——An iſland formerly called Œnopia, in a part of the Ægean ſea, called Saronicus Sinus. The inhabitants were once deſtroyed by a peſtilence, and the country was repeopled by ants changed into men by Jupiter, at the prayer of king Æacus. They were very powerful by ſea, and gave themſelves to Darius when he demanded ſubmiſſion from all the Greeks. The Athenians under Pericles expelled them from their poſſeſſions; the iſland is now called Engia. Herodot. 5, 6 & 7.—Pauſ. 2, c. 29.—Strab. 8.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 10.

ÆGINĒTES, a king of Arcadia, in whoſe age Lycurgus inſtituted his famous laws. Pauſ. 1, c. 5.

ÆGIŎCHUS, a ſirname of Jupiter, from his uſing the goat Amalthæa's ſkin, inſtead of a ſhield, in the war of the Titans. Diod. 5.

ÆGIPAN, a name of Pan, becauſe he had goats feet.

ÆGIRA, a town between Ætolia and Peloponneſus.——A town of Achaia. Pauſ. 7, c. 26.—Herodot. 1, c. 145.

ÆGIROESSA, a town of Ætolia. Herodot. 1, c. 149.

ÆGIS, the ſhield of Jupiter, απο της αιγος, a goat's ſkin. This was the goat Amalthæa, with whoſe ſkin he covered his ſhield. The goat was placed among the conſtellations. Jupiter gave this ſhield to Pallas, who placed upon it Meduſa's head, which turned into ſtones all thoſe who fixed their eyes upon it. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 352 & 435.

ÆGISTHUS, king of Argos, was ſon of Thyeſtes by his daughter Pelopea. Thyeſtes being at variance with his brother Atreus, was told by the oracle, that his wrongs could be revenged only by a ſon born of himſelf and his daughter. To avoid ſuch an inceſt, Pelopea had been conſecrated to the ſervice of Minerva by her father, who ſome time after met her in a wood, and raviſhed her, without knowing who ſhe was. Pelopea kept the ſword of her raviſher, and finding it to be her father's, expoſed the child ſhe had brought forth. The child was preſerved, and when grown up, preſented with the ſword of his mother's raviſher. Pelopea, ſoon after this melancholy adventure, had married her uncle Atreus, who received into his houſe her natural ſon. As Thyeſtes had debauched the firſt wife of Atreus, Atreus ſent Ægiſthus to put him to death; but Thyeſtes knowing the aſſaſſin's ſword, diſcovered he was his own ſon, and, fully to revenge his wrongs, ſent him back to murder Atreus. After this murder Thyeſtes aſcended the throne, and baniſhed Agamemnon and Menelaus, the ſons, or as others ſay, the grandſons of Atreus. Theſe children were taken care of by Œneus, king of Ætolia. By their marriage with the daughters of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, they were impowered to recover the kingdom of Argos, in which Agamemnon ſucceeded, while Menelaus reigned in his father-in-law's place.

place. Ægiſthus had been reconciled to the ſons of Atreus; and when they went to the Trojan war, he was left guardian of Agamemnon's kingdoms, and of his wife Clytemneſtra. Ægiſthus fell in love with Clytemneſtra, and lived with her. On Agamemnon's return, theſe two adulterers murdered him, and, by a public marriage, ſtrengthened themſelves on the throne of Argos. Oreſtes, Agamemnon's ſon, would have ſhared his father's fate, had not his ſiſter Electra privately ſent him to his uncle Strophius, king of Phocis, where he contracted the moſt intimate friendſhip with his couſin Pylades. Some time after, Oreſtes came to Mycenæ, the reſidence of Ægiſthus, and reſolved to puniſh the murderers of his father, in conjunction with Electra, who lived in diſguiſe in the tyrant's family. To effect this more effectually, Electra publicly declared that her brother Oreſtes was dead; upon which Ægiſthus and Clytemneſtra went to the temple of Apollo, to return thanks to the god for his death. Oreſtes, who had ſecretly concealed himſelf in the temple, attacked them, and put them both to death, after a reign of ſeven years. They were buried without the city walls. [*Vid. ÆGOS POTĂMOS, i. e. the goats river, a town in the Thracian Cherſoneſus, with a river where the Athenian fleet, conſiſting of 180 ſhips, was defeated by Lyſander, on the 13th Dec. B. C. 405, in the laſt year of the Peloponneſian war. Mela 2, c. 2.—Plin. 2, c. 58.—Pauſ. 3, c. 8 & 11.

ÆGOSĂGÆ, an Aſiatic nation under Attălus, with whom he conquered Aſia, and to whom he gave a ſettlement near the Helleſpont. Polyb. 5.

ÆGUS and ROSCILLUS, two brothers amongſt the Allobroges, who deſerted from Cæſar to Pompey. Cæſ. bell. civ. 3, c. 59.

ÆGY, a town near Sparta, deſtroyed becauſe its inhabitants were ſuſpected by the Spartans of favoring the Arcadians. Pauſ. 3, c. 2.

ÆGYPĂNES, a nation in the middle of Africa, whoſe body is human above the waiſt, and that of a goat below. Mela. 1, c. 4 & 8.

ÆGYPSUS, a town of the Getæ, near the Danube. Ovid. ex Pont. 1. ep. 8. l. 4, ep. 7.

ÆGYPTII, the inhabitants of Egypt. [Vid. Ægyptus.]

ÆGYPTIUM MARE, that part of the Mediterranean ſea which is on the coaſt of Egypt.

ÆGYPTUS, ſon of Belus, and brother to Danaus, gave his 50 ſons in marriage to the 50 daughters of his brother. Danaus, who had eſtabliſhed himſelf at Argos, and was jealous of his brother, obliged all his daughters to murder their huſbands the firſt night of their nuptials. This was executed; but Hypermneſtra alone ſpared her huſband Lynceus. Even Ægyptus was killed by his niece Polyxena. Vid. Danaus, Danaides, Lynceus.——Ægyptus was king, after his father, of a part of Africa, which from him has been called Ægyptus. Hygin. fab. 168, 170.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Ovid. Heroid. 14.—Pauſ. 7, c. 21.

ÆGYPTUS, an extenſive country of Africa watered by the Nile, bounded on the eaſt by Arabia, and on the weſt by Libya. Its name is derived from Ægyptus brother to Danaus. Its extent, according to modern calculation, is 180 from north to ſouth, and it meaſures 120 leagues on the ſhore of the Mediterranean; but at the diſtance of 50 leagues from the ſea, it diminiſhes ſo much as ſcarce to meaſure 7 or 8 leagues between the mountains on the eaſt and weſt. It is divided into lower, which lies near the Mediterranean, and upper, which is towards the ſouth.

Upper Egypt is famous for the town of Thebes, Lower Egypt was the moſt peopled. It contains the Delta, a number of large iſlands, which, from their form, have been called after the fourth letter of the Greek alphabet. This country has been the mother of arts and ſciences. The greateſt part of Lower Egypt has been formed by the mud and ſand which the Nile carries down. The Egyptians reckoned themſelves the moſt ancient nation in the univerſe. (Vid. Pſammetichus.) Some authors make them of Æthiopian origin. They are remarkable for their ſuperſtition; they paid as much honor to the cat, the crocodile, the bull, and even to onions, as to Iſis. Rain never or ſeldom falls in this country; the fertility of the ſoil originates in the yearly inundations of the Nile, which riſes about 25 feet above the ſurface of the earth, and exhibits a large plain of waters, in which are ſcattered here and there, the towns and villages, as the Cyclades in the Ægean ſea. The air is not wholeſome, the population is great, and the cattle very prolific. It is ſaid that Egypt once contained 20,000 cities. It was governed by kings who have immortalized themſelves by the pyramids they have raiſed and the canals they have opened. The prieſts traced the exiſtence of the country for many thouſand years, and fondly imagined that the gods were their firſt ſovereigns, and that their monarchy laſted 11,340 years according to Herodotus. According to the calculation of Conſtantine Manaſſes, the kingdom of Egypt laſted 1663 years from its beginning under Miſraim the ſon of Ham, 2188 B. C. to the conqueſt of Cambyſes, 525 B. C. Egypt revolted afterwards from the Perſian power, B. C. 414, and Amyrtæus then became king. After him ſucceeded Pſammetichus, whoſe reign began 408 B. C. Nephereus 396. Acoris 389. Pſammuthis 376. Nepherites 4 months, and Nectanebis, 375. Tachos, or Teos, 363. Nectanebus, 361. It was conquered by Ochus 350 B. C.; and after the conqueſt of Perſia by Alexander, Ptolemy refounded the kingdom, and began to reign 323 B. C. Philadelphus, 284. Evergetes, 246. Philopater, 221, Epiphanes, 204. Philomator, 180 and 169, conjointly with Evergetes II. or Phyſcon, for 6 years. Evergetes II. 145. Lathurus Soter, and his mother Cleopatra, 116. Alexander of Cyprus, and Cleopatra, 106. Lathurus Soter reſtored, 88. Cleopatra II. 6 months, with Alexander the ſecond 19 days, 81. Ptolemy, ſirnamed Alexander III. 80. Dionyſius, ſirnamed Auletes, 65. Dionyſius II. with Cleopatra III. 51. Cleopatra III. with young Ptolemy, 46, and in 30 B. C. it was reduced by Auguſtus into a Roman province. The hiſtory of Egypt, therefore, can be divided into three epochas; the firſt beginning with the foundation of the empire, to the conqueſt of Cambyſes; the ſecond ends at the death of Alexander; and the third comprehends the reign of the Ptolemies, and ends at the death of Cleopatra, in the age of Auguſtus. Strab. 17.—Herodot. 2, 3 & 7.—*Theocrit. ÆLIA, the wife of Sylla. Plut. in Syll. ——The name of ſome towns built or repaired by the emperor Adrian.

ÆLIA lex, enacted by Ælius Tubero the tribune, A. U. C. 559, to ſend two colonies into the country of the Brutii. Liv. 34, c. 53.——Another A. U. C. 568, ordaining, that, in public affairs, the augurs ſhould obſerve the appearance of the ſky, and the magiſtrates be empowered to poſtpone the buſineſs.——Another called Ælia Sextia, by Ælius Sextus, A. U. C. 756, which enacted, that all ſlaves who bore any marks of puniſhment received from their maſters, or who had been impriſoned, ſhould be ſet at liberty, but not rank as Roman citizens.

ÆLIA PETINA, of the family of Tubero, married Claudius Cæſar, by whom ſhe had a ſon. The emperor divorced her, to marry Meſſalina. Sueton. in Claud. 26.

ÆLIANUS CLAUDUS, a Roman ſophiſt of Præneſte, in the reign of Adrian. He firſt taught rhetoric at Rome; but being diſguſted with his profeſſion, he became author, and publiſhed treatiſes on animals in 17 books, on various hiſtory in 14 books, &c. in Greek, a language which he preferred to Latin. In his writings he ſhows himſelf very fond of the marvellous, and relates many ſtories which are often devoid of elegance and purity of ſtyle; though Philoſtratus has commended his language as ſuperior to what could be expected from a perſon who was neither born nor educated in Greece. Ælian died in the 60th year of his age, A. D. 140. The beſt edition of his works collected together, is that of Conrad Geſner, folio, printed Tiguri, 1556, though now ſeldom to be met with. Some attribute the treatiſe on the tactics of the Greeks to another Ælian.

ÆLIUS & ÆLIA, a family in Rome, ſo poor that 16 lived in a ſmall houſe, and were maintained by the produce of a little field. Their poverty continued till Paulus conquered Perſeus king of Macedonia, and gave his ſon-in-law Æl. Tubero five pounds of gold from the booty. Val. Max. 4, c. 4.

Ælius Adriānus, an African, grandfather to the emperor Adrian.——Gallus, a Roman knight, the firſt who invaded Arabia Felix. He was very intimate with Strabo the geographer, and ſailed on the Nile with him to take a view of the country. Plin. 6, c. 28.——Publius, one of the firſt queſtors choſen from the plebeians at Rome. Liv. 4, c. 54.——Q. Æl. Pætus, ſon of Sextus or Publius. As he ſat in the ſenate-houſe, a woodpecker perched on his head; upon which a ſouthſayer exclaimed, that if he preſerved the bird, his houſe would floriſh, and Rome decay; and if he killed it, the contrary muſt happen. Hearing this, Ælius, in the preſence of the ſenate, bit off the head of the bird. All the youths of his family were killed at Cannæ, and the Roman arms were ſoon attended with ſucceſs. Val. Max. 5, c. 6.——Saturnius, a ſatyriſt, thrown down from the Tarpeian rock for writing verſes againſt Tiberius.——Sejānus, Vid. Sejanus.——Sextus Catus, cenſor with M. Cethegus. He ſeparated the ſenators from the people in the public ſpectacles. During his conſulſhip, the ambaſſadors of the Ætolians found him feaſting in earthen diſhes, and offered him ſilver veſſels, which he refuſed, ſatisfied with the earthen cups, &c. which, for his virtues, he had received from his father-in-law, L. Paulus, after the conqueſt of Macedonia. Plin. 33, c. 11.——Spartiānus, wrote the lives of the emperors Adrian, Antoninus Pius, & M. Aurelius. He floriſhed A. D. 240.——Tubero, grandſon of L. Paulus, was auſtere in his morals, and a formidable enemy to the Gracchi. His grandſon was accuſed before Cæſar, and ably defended by Cicero. Cic. ep. ad Brut.——Verus Cæſar, the name of L. C. Commodus Verus, after Adrian had adopted him. He was made pretor and conſul by the emperor, who was ſoon convinced of his incapacity in the diſcharge of public duty. He killed himſelf by drinking an antidote; and Antoninus, ſirnamed Pius, was adopted in his place. Ælius was father to Antoninus Verus, whom Pius adopted.——A phyſician mentioned by Galen.——L. Gallus, a lawyer, who wrote 12 books concerning the ſignification of all law words.——Sextus Pætus, a lawyer, conſul at Rome A. U. C. 554. He is greatly commended by Cicero for his learning, and called cordatus homo by Ennius for his knowledge of law. Cic. in Brut. 20.——Stilo, a native of Lanuvium, maſter to N. Ter. Varro, and author of ſome treatiſes.—Lamia, Vid. Lamia.

Aello, one of the Harpies, (from ελουσα αλλο, alienum tollens, or αιλλα tempeſtas.) Flacc. 4, c. 450. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 710.——One of Actæon's dogs.

Ælurus, (a cat), a deity worſhipped by the Egyptians; and after death, embalmed, and buried in the city of Bubaſtis. Herodot. 2, c. 66, &c.—Diod. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. 1.

Max.* 6, c. 7.——Lepĭda, daughter of Lepidus, married Druſus the younger, whom ſhe diſgraced by her wantonneſs. She killed herſelf when accuſed of adultery with a ſlave. Tacit. 6, c. 40.——A part of Italy, called alſo Flaminia. Martial. 6, ep. 85.——A public road leading from Placentia to to Ariminum; called after the conſul Æmylius, who is ſuppoſed to have made it. Martial. 3, p. 4.

ÆMYLIĀNUS, a name of Africanus the younger, ſon of P. Æmylius. In him the families of the Scipios and Æmylii were united. Many of that family bore the ſame name. Juv. 8, v. 2.

ÆMYLII, a noble family in Rome, deſcended from Æmylius, who reckoned Æneas among his anceſtors. Plutarch ſays, that they are deſcended from Mamercus, the ſon of Pythagoras, ſirnamed Æmylius, in Num. & Æmyl.

ÆMYLIUS, a beautiful youth of Sybaris, whoſe wife met with the ſame fate as Procris. Vid. Procris.——Cenſorinus, a cruel tyrant of Sicily, who liberally rewarded thoſe who invented new ways of torturing. Paterculus gave him a brazen horſe for this purpoſe, and the tyrant made the firſt experiment upon the donor. Plut. de Fort. Rom.—Lepidus, a youth who had a ſtatue in the capitol, for ſaving the life of a citizen in a battle. Val. Max. 4, c. 1.—A triumvir with Octavius. Vid. Lepidus.——Macer, a poet of Verona in the Auguſtan age. He wrote ſome poems upon ſerpents, birds, and, as ſome ſuppoſe, on bees. The book, which is extant, on the virtues of herbs, and bears his name, is not, according to Scaliger, the production either of a great poet or learned phyſician. From the epithet Iliacum, given him by Ovid, ſome imagine that Macer wrote an account of the Trojan war. Macer died a few years before the birth of Chriſt. Ovid. Triſt. 4, el. 16. ——Marcus Scaurus, a Roman who floriſhed about 100 years B. C. and wrote three books concerning his own life. Cic. in Brut. ——A poet in the age of Tiberius, who wrote a tragedy called Atheus, and deſtroyed himſelf.——Sura, another writer on the Roman year.——Mamercus, three times dictator, conquered the Fidenates, and took their city. He limited to one year and a half, the cenſorſhip, which before his time was exerciſed during five years. Liv. 4, c. 17, 19, &c.——Papiniānus, ſon of Hoſtilius Papinianus, was in favour with the emperor Severus, and was made governor to his ſons Geta and Caracalla. Geta was killed by his brother, and Papinianus, for upbraiding him, was murdered by his ſoldiers. From his ſchool the Romans have had many able lawyers, who were called Papinianiſts. ——Pappus, a cenſor, who baniſhed from the ſenate, P. Corn. Ruffinus, who had been twice conſul, becauſe he had at his table ten pounds of ſilver plate, A. U. C. 478. Liv. 14.——Porcina, an elegant orator. Cic. in. Brut.—Rectus, a ſevere governor of Egypt, under Tiberus. Dio.——Regillus, conquered the general of Antiochus at ſea, and obtained a naval triumph. Liv. 37, c. 31.—Scaurus, a noble, but poor citizen of Rome. His father, to maintain himſelf, was a coal merchant. He was edile, and afterwards pretor. He fought againſt Jugurtha.—His ſon Marcus, was ſon-in-law to Sylla, and in his edileſhip he built a very magnificent theatre. Plin. 36. c. 15.——A bridge at Rome, called alſo Sublicius. Juv. 6, v. 32.

Cyneg.* 1.—He married Creuſa, Priam's daughter, by whom he had a ſon called Aſcanius. During the Trojan war, he behaved with great valor, in defence of his country, and came to an engagement with Diomedes and Achilles. Yet Strabo, Dictys of Crete, Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, and Dares of Phrygia, accuſe him of betraying his country to the Greeks, with Antenor, and of preſerving his life and fortune by this treacherous meaſure. He lived at variance with Priam, becauſe he received not ſufficient marks of diſtinction from the king and his family, as Homer. Il. 13, ſays. This might have provoked him to ſeek revenge by perfidy.—Authors of credit report, that when Troy was in flames, he carried away, upon his ſhoulders, his father Anchiſes, and the ſtatues of his houſhold gods, leading in his hand his ſon Aſcanius, and leaving his wife to follow behind. Some ſay that he retired to mount Ida, where he built a fleet of 20 ſhips, and ſet ſail in queſt of a ſettlement. Strabo and others maintain that Æneas never left his country, but rebuilt Troy, where he reigned, and his poſterity after him. Even Homer, who lived 400 years after the Trojan war, ſays, Il. 20, v. 30, &c. that the gods deſtined Æneas and his poſterity to reign over the Trojans. This paſſage Dionyſ. Hal. explained, by ſaying that Homer meant the Trojans who had gone over to Italy with Æneas, and not the actual inhabitants of Troy. According to Virgil and other Latin authors, who, to make their court to the Roman emperors, traced their origin up to Æneas, and deſcribed his arrival into Italy quered Perſeus king of Macedonia, and gave his ſon-in-law Æl. Tubero five pounds of gold from the booty. Val. Max. 4, c. 4.

Ælius Adriānus, an African, grandfather to the emperor Adrian.——Gallus, a Roman-knight, the firſt who invaded Arabia Felix. He was very intimate with Strabo the geographer, and ſailed on the Nile with him to take a view of the country. Plin. 6, c. 28.——Publius, one of the firſt queſtors choſen from the plebeians at Rome. Liv. 4, c. 54.——Q. Æl. Pætus, ſon of Sextus or Publius. As he ſat in the ſenate-houſe, a woodpecker perched on his head; upon which a ſouthſayer exclaimed, that if he preſerved the bird, his houſe would floriſh, and Rome decay; and if he killed it, the contrary muſt happen. Hearing this, Ælius, in the preſence of the ſenate, bit off the head of the bird. All the youths of his family were killed at Cannæ, and the Roman arms were ſoon attended with ſucceſs. Val. Max. 5, c. 6.——Saturnius, a ſatyriſt, thrown down from the Tarpeian rock for writing verſes againſt Tiberius.——Sejānus, Vid. Sejanus.——Sextus Catus, cenſor with M. Cethegus. He ſeparated the ſenators from the people in the public ſpectacles. During his conſulſhip, the ambaſſadors of the Ætolians found him feaſting in earthen diſhes, and offered him ſilver veſſels, which he refuſed, ſatisfied with the earthen cups, &c. which, for his virtues, he had received from his father-in-law, L. Paulus, after the conqueſt of Macedonia. Plin. 33, c. 11.——Spartiānus, wrote the lives of the emperors Adrian, Antoninus Pius, & M. Aurelius. He floriſhed A. D. 240.——Tubero, grandſon of L. Paulus, was auſtere in his morals, and a formidable enemy to the Gracchi. His grandſon was accuſed before Cæſar, and ably defended by Cicero. Cic. ep. ad Brut.——Verus Cæſar, the name of L. C. Commodus Verus, after Adrian had adopted him. He was made pretor and conſul by the emperor, who was ſoon convinced of his incapacity in the diſcharge of public duty. He killed himſelf by drinking an antidote; and Antoninus, ſirnamed Pius, was adopted in his place. Ælius was father to Antoninus Verus, whom Pius adopted.——A phyſician mentioned by Galen.——L. Gallus, a lawyer, who wrote 12 books concerning the ſignification of all law words.——Sextus Pætus, a lawyer, conſul at Rome A. U. C. 554. He is greatly commended by Cicero for his learning, and called cordatus homo by Ennius for his knowledge of law. Cic. in Brut. 20.——Stilo, a native of Lanuvium, maſter to N. Ter. Varro, and author of ſome treatiſes.—Lamia, Vid. Lamia.

Flacc. 4, c. 450. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 710.—One of Actæon's dogs.

Æmathion. Vid. Emathion.

Æmilia lex, was enacted by the dictator Æmilius, A. U. C. 309. It ordained, that the cenſorſhip, which was before quinquennial, ſhould be limited to one year and a half. Liv. 9, c. 33.——Another in the ſecond conſulſhip of Æmilius Mamercus, A. U. C. 392. It gave power to the eldeſt pretor to drive a nail in the capitol on the ides of September. Liv. 7, c. 3. The driving of a nail was a ſuperſtitious ceremony, by which the Romans ſuppoſed that a peſtilence could be ſtopped, or an impending calamity averted.

Æmiliānus, (C. Julius), a native of Mauritania, proclaimed emperor after the death of Decius. He marched againſt Gallus and Valerian, but was informed they had been murdered by their own troops. He ſoon after ſhared their fate.——One of the thirty tyrants who rebelled in the reign of Gallienus.

Æmilius. Vid. Æmylius.

Æmnestus, tyrant of Enna, was depoſed by Dionyſius the elder. Diod. 14.

Æmon. Vid. Hæmon.

Æmŏna, a large city of Aſia. Cic. pro Flacc.

Æmŏnia, a country of Greece, which receives its name from Æmon, or Æmus. It was afterwards called Theſſaly. Achilles is called Æmonius, as being born there. Ovid. Triſt. 3, el. 11. l. 4, el. 1.—Horat. 1. od. 37. It was alſo called Pyrrha, from Pyrrha, Deucalion's wife, who reigned there.

Æmŏnĭdes, a prieſt of Apollo in Italy, killed by Æneas. Vid. Æn. 10, v. 537.

Æmus, an actor in Domitian's reign. Juv. 6, v. 197.

Æmylia, a noble family in Rome, deſcended from Mamercus, ſon of Pythagoras, who, for his humanity, was called Αιμυλος, blandus.——A veſtal who rekindled the fire of Veſta, which was extinguiſhed, by putting her veil over it. Val. Max. 1, c. 1.—Dionyſ. Hal. 2.——The wife of Africanus the elder, famous for her behaviour to her huſband, when ſuſpected of infidelity. Val. Max. 6, c. 7.——Lepĭda, daughter of Lepidus, married Druſus the younger, whom ſhe diſgraced by her wantonneſs. She killed herſelf when accuſed of adultery with a ſlave. Tacit. 6, c. 40.——A part of Italy, called alſo Flaminia. Martial. 6, ep. 85.——A public road leading from Placentia to Ariminum; called after the conſul Æmylius, who is ſuppoſed to have made it. Martial. 3, p. 4.

ÆMYLIĀNUS, a name of Africanus the younger, ſon of P. Æmylius. In him the families of the Scipios and Æmylii were united. Many of that family bore the ſame name. Juv. 8, v. 2.

ÆMYLII, a noble family in Rome, deſcended from Æmylius, who reckoned Æneas among his anceſtors. Plutarch ſays, that they are deſcended from Mamercus, the ſon of Pythagoras, ſirnamed Æmylius, in Num. & Æmyl.

ÆMYLIUS, a beautiful youth of Sybaris, whoſe wife met with the ſame fate as Procris. Vid. Procris.——Cenſorinus, a cruel tyrant of Sicily, who liberally rewarded thoſe who invented new ways of torturing. Paterculus gave him a brazen horſe for this purpoſe, and the tyrant made the firſt experiment upon the donor. Plut. de Fort. Rom.—Lepidus, a youth who had a ſtatue in the capitol, for ſaving the life of a citizen in a battle. Val. Max. 4, c. 1.—A triumvir with Octavius. Vid. Lepidus.——Macer, a poet of Verona in the Auguſtan age. He wrote ſome poems upon ſerpents, birds, and, as ſome ſuppoſe, on bees. The book, which is extant, on the virtues of herbs, and bears his name, is not, according to Scaliger, the production either of a great poet or learned phyſician. From the epithet Iliacum, given him by Ovid, ſome imagine that Macer wrote an account of the Trojan war. Macer died a few years before the birth of Chriſt. Ovid. Triſt. 4, el. 16. ——Marcus Scaurus, a Roman who floriſhed about 100 years B. C. and wrote three books concerning his own life. Cic. in Brut. ——A poet in the age of Tiberius, who wrote a tragedy called Atheus, and deſtroyed himſelf.——Sura, another writer on the Roman year.——Mamercus, three times dictator, conquered the Fidenates, and took their city. He limited to one year and a half, the cenſorſhip, which before his time was exerciſed during five years. Liv. 4, c. 17, 19, &c.——Papiniānus, ſon of Hoſtilius Papinianus, was in favour with the emperor Severus, and was made governor to his ſons Geta and Caracalla. Geta was killed by his brother, and Papinianus, for upbraiding him, was murdered by his ſoldiers. From his ſchool the Romans have had many able lawyers, who were called Papinianiſts. ——Pappus, a cenſor, who baniſhed from the ſenate, P. Corn. Ruffinus, who had been twice conſul, becauſe he had at his table ten pounds of ſilver plate, A. U. C. 478. Liv. 14.——Porcina, an elegant orator. Cic. in. Brut.—Rectus, a ſevere governor of Egypt, under Tiberus. Dio.——Regillus, conquered the general of Antiochus at ſea, and obtained a naval triumph. Liv. 37, c. 31.—Scaurus, a noble, but poor citizen of Rome. His father, to maintain himſelf, was a coal merchant. He was edile, and afterwards pretor. He fought againſt Jugurtha.—His ſon Marcus, was ſon-in-law to Sylla, and in his edileſhip he built a very magnificent theatre. Plin. 36. c. 15.——A bridge at Rome, called alſo Sublicius. Juv. 6, v. 32.

ÆNĒA or ÆNEIA, a town of Macedonia, 15 miles from Theſſalonica, founded by Æneas. Liv. 40, c. 4. l. 44, c. 10.

ÆNĒĂDES, a town of Cherſoneſus, built by Æneas. Caſſander deſtroyed it, and carried the inhabitants to Theſſalonica, lately built. Dionyſ. Hal. 1.

ÆNĒĂDÆ, a name given to the friends and campanions of Æneas, by Virg. Æn. 1, v. 161.

ÆNĒAS, a Trojan prince, ſon of Anchiſes and the goddeſs Venus. The opinions of authors concerning his character are different. He was educated by Chiron. Xenop. Cyneg. 1.—He married Creuſa, Priam's daughter, by whom he had a ſon called Aſcanius. During the Trojan war, he behaved with great valor, in defence of his country, and came to an engagement with Diomedes and Achilles. Yet Strabo, Dictys of Crete, Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, and Dares of Phrygia, accuſe him of betraying his country to the Greeks, with Antenor, and of preſerving his life and fortune by this treacherous meaſure. He lived at variance with Priam, becauſe he received not ſufficient marks of diſtinction from the king and his family, as Homer. Il. 13, ſays. This might have provoked him to ſeek revenge by perfidy.—Authors of credit report, that when Troy was in flames, he carried away, upon his ſhoulders, his father Anchiſes, and the ſtatues of his houſhold gods, leading in his hand his ſon Aſcanius, and leaving his wife to follow behind. Some ſay that he retired to mount Ida, where he built a fleet of 20 ſhips, and ſet ſail in queſt of a ſettlement. Strabo and others maintain that Æneas never left his country, but rebuilt Troy, where he reigned, and his poſterity after him. Even Homer, who lived 400 years after the Trojan war, ſays, Il. 20, v. 30, &c. that the gods deſtined Æneas and his poſterity to reign over the Trojans. This paſſage Dionyſ. Hal. explained, by ſaying that Homer meant the Trojans who had gone over to Italy with Æneas, and not the actual inhabitants of Troy. According to Virgil and other Latin authors, who, to make their court to the Roman emperors, traced their origin up to Æneas, and deſcribed his arrival into Italy as indubitable, he with his fleet first came to the Thracian Chersonesus, where Polymnestor, one of his allies, reigned. After visiting Delos, the Strophades, and Crete, where he expected to find the empire promised him by the oracle, as in the place where his progenitors were born, he landed in Epirus and Drepanum, the court of king Acestes, in Sicily, where he buried his father. From Sicily he sailed for Italy, but was driven on the coasts of Africa, and kindly received by Dido queen of Carthage, to whom, on his first interview, he gave one of the garments of the beautiful Helen. Dido being enamoured of him, wished to marry him; but he left Carthage by order of the gods. In his voyage he was driven to Sicily, and from thence he passed to Cumæ, where the Sybil conducted him to hell, that he might hear from his father the fates which attended him and all his posterity. After a voyage of seven years, and the loss of 13 ships, he came to the Tyber. Latinus, the king of the country, received him with hospitality, and promised him his daughter Lavinia, who had been before betrothed to king Turnus by her mother Amata. To prevent this marriage, Turnus made war against Æneas; and after many battles, the war was decided by a combat between the two rivals, in which Turnus was killed. Æneas married Lavinia, in whose honor he built the town of Lavinium, and succeeded his father-in-law. After a short reign, Æneas was killed in a battle against the Etrurians. Some say that he was drowned in the Numicus, and his body weighed down by his armour; upon which the Latins, not finding their king, supposed that he had been taken up to heaven, and therefore offered him sacrifices as to a god. Dionys. Hal. fixes the arrival of Æneas in Italy in the 54th olymp. Some authors suppose that Æneas, after the siege of Troy, fell to the share of Neoptolemus, together with Andromache, and that he was carried to Thessaly, whence he escaped to Italy. Others say, that after he had come to Italy, he returned to Troy, leaving Ascanius king of Latium. Æneas has been praised for his piety, and submission to the will of the gods. *Homer. He succeeded Ascanius in Latium. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 770.—Liv. 1, c. 3.——An ambassador sent by the Lacedæmonians to Athens, to treat of peace, in the 8th year of the Peloponnesian war.—An ancient author who wrote on tactics, besides other treatises, which, according to Ælian, were epitomised by Cineas the friend of Pyrrhus.—A native of Gaza, who, from a Platonic philosopher became a christian, A. D. 485, and wrote a dialogue called Theophrastus, on the immortality of the soul, and the resurrection.

ÆNĒIA, or ÆNIA, a place near Rome, afterwards called Janiculum.——A city of Troas. Strab. 17.——A city of Macedonia. Dionys. Hal. 1.

ÆNĒIS, a poem of Virgil, which has for its subject the settlement of Æneas in Italy. The great merit of this poem is well known. The author has imitated Homer, and, as some say, Homer is superior to him only because he is more ancient, and is an original. Virgil died before he had corrected it, and at his death desired it might be burnt. This was happily disobeyed, and Augustus saved from the flames, a poem which proved his family to be descended from the kings of Troy. The Æneid had engaged the attention of the poet for 11 years, and in the first six books it seems that it was Virgil's design to imitate Homer's Odyssey, and in the last the Iliad. The action of the poem comprehends eight years, one of which only, the last, is really taken up by action, as the seven first are merely episodes, such as Juno's attempts to destroy the Trojans, the loves of Æneas and Dido, the relation of the fall of Troy, &c.—In the first book of the Æneid, the hero is introduced, in the seventh year of his expedition, sailing in the Mediterranean, and shipwrecked on the African coast, where he is received by Dido. In the second, Æneas, at the desire of the Phœnician queen, relates the fall of Troy, and his flight through the general conflagration to mount Ida. In the third, the hero continues his narration, by a minute account of his voyage through the Cyclades, the places where he landed, and the dreadful storm with the description of which the poem opened. Dido, in the fourth book, makes public her partiality to Æneas, which is slighted by the sailing of the Trojans from Carthage, and the book closes with the suicide of the disappointed queen. In the fifth book, Æneas sails to Sicily, where he celebrates the anniversary of his father's death, and thence pursues his way to Italy. In the sixth, he visits the Elysian fields, and learns from his father the fate which attends him and his descendants the Romans. In the seventh book, the hero reaches the destined land of Latium, and concludes a treaty with the king of the country, which is soon broken by the interference of Juno, who ſtimulates Turnus to war. The auxiliaries of the enemy are enumerated; and in the eighth book, Æneas is aſſiſted by Evander, and receives from Venus a ſhield wrought by Vulcan, on which are repreſented the future glory and triumphs of the Roman nation. The reader is pleaſed, in the ninth book, with the account of battles between the rival armies, and the immortal friendſhip of Niſus and Euryalus. Jupiter, in the tenth, attempts a reconciliation between Venus and Juno, who patroniſed the oppoſite parties; the fight is renewed, Pallas killed, and Turnus ſaved from the avenging hand of Æneas, by the interpoſition of Juno. The eleventh book gives an account of the funeral of Pallas, and of the meditated reconciliation between Æneas and Latinus, which the ſudden appearance of the enemy defeats. Camilla is ſlain, and the combatants ſeparated by the night. In the laſt book, Juno prevents the ſingle combat agreed upon by Turnus and Æneas. The Trojans are defeated in the abſence of their king; but on the return of Æneas, the battle aſſumes a different turn, a ſingle combat is fought by the rival leaders, and the poem is concluded by the death of king Turnus. Plin. 7, c. 30, &c.

ÆNEIDES, a patronymic given to Aſcanius, as ſon of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 653.

ÆNESIDĒMUS, a brave general of Argos. Liv. 32, c. 25.—A Cretan philoſopher, who wrote 8 books on the doctrine of his maſter Pyrrho. Diogin. Pyr.

ÆNĒSIUS, a ſirname of Jupiter, from mount Ænum.

ÆNĒTUS, a victor at Olympia, who, in the moment of victory, died through exceſs of joy. Pauſ. 3, c. 18.

ÆNIA. Vid. ÆNEIA.

ÆNICUS, a comic writer at Athens.

ÆNIŎCHI, a people of Aſiatic Sarmatia. Lucan. 2, v. 591.

ÆNOBARBUS, or Ahenobarbus, the ſirname of Domitius. When Caſtor and Pollux acquainted him with a victory, he diſcredited them; upon which they touched his chin and beard, which inſtantly became of a brazen color, whence the ſirname given to himſelf and his deſcendants.

ÆNŎCLES, a writer of Rhodes. Athen.

ÆNOS, an independent city of Thrace, confounded with Æneia, of which Æneas was the founder. Mela. 2, c. 2.

ÆNUM, a town of Thrace—of Theſſaly.—A mountain in Cephallenia. Strab. 7.——A river and village near Oſſa.——A city of Crete built by Æneas.

ÆNŸRA, a place in Thaſos. Herodot. 6, c. 47.

ÆOLIA, a name given to Arne. Sappho is called Æolia puella, by Horace, 4, od. 9, v. 12.

ÆŎLIA, or Æolis, a country of Aſia Minor, near the Ægean ſea. It has Troas at the north, and Ionia at the ſouth. The inhabitants were of Grecian origin, and were maſters of many of the neighbouring iſlands. They had 12, others ſay 30 conſiderable cities, of which Cumæ and Leſbos were the moſt famous. They receive their name from Æolus ſon of Hellenus. They migrated from Greece about 1124 B. C. 80 years before the migration of the Ionian tribes. Herodot. 1, c. 26, &c.—Strab. 1, 2 & 6.—Plin. 5, c. 30.—Mela. 1, c. 2 & 18.——Theſſaly has been anciently called Æolia. Bœotus, ſon of Neptune, having ſettled there, called his followers Bœotians, and their country Bœotia.

ÆOLIÆ and ÆOLĬDES, ſeven iſlands between Sicily and Italy; they are Lipara, Hiera, Strongyle, Didyme, Ericuſa, Phœnicuſa, and Euonymos. They were the retreat of the winds; and Virg. Æn. 1, v. 56, calls them Æolia, and the kingdom of Æolus the god of ſtorms and winds. They ſometimes bear the name of Vulcaniæ and Hephæſtiades, and are known now among the moderns under the general appellation of Lipari iſlands. Juſtin. 4, c. 1.

ÆOLĬDA, a city of Tenedos——Another near Thermopylæ. Herodot. 8, c. 35.

ÆOLĬDES, a patronymic of Ulyſſes, from Æolus; becauſe Anticlea, his mother, was pregnant by Siſyphus, the ſon of Æolus, when ſhe married Laertes. It is alſo given to Athamas and Miſenus, as ſons of Æolus. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 511, l. 13, v. 31.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 164 & 529.

ÆŎLUS, the king of ſtorms and winds, was the ſon of Hippotas. He reigned over Æolia; and becauſe he was the inventor of ſails, and a great aſtronomer, the poets have called him the god of the wind. It is ſaid that he confined in a bag, and gave Ulyſſes, all the winds that could blow againſt his veſſel, when he returned to Ithaca. The companions of Ulyſſes untied the bag, and gave the winds their liberty. Æolus was indebted to Juno for his royal dignity, according to Virgil. The name ſeems to be derived from αιολος, varius, becauſe the winds over which he preſided are ever varying.——There are two others, a king of Etruria, father to Macareus and Canace, and a ſon of Hellenus, often confounded with the god of the winds. This laſt married Enaretta, by whom he had ſeven ſons and five daughters. Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Homer. Od. 10, v. 1.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 478. l. 14, v. 224.—Apollon. 4, Argon.—Flacc. 1, c. 556.—Diod. 4 & 5.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 56, &c.

ÆŌRA, a feſtival in Athens, in honor of Erigone.

ÆPĂLIUS, a king of Greece, reſtored to his kingdom by Hercules, whoſe ſon Hyllus he adopted. Strab. 9.

ÆPĔA, a town of Crete, called Solis, in honor of Solon. Plut. in Solon.

ÆPŬLO, a general of the Iſtrians, who drank to exceſs, after he had ſtormed the camp of A. Manlius, the Roman general. Being attacked by a ſoldier, he fled to a neighbouring town, which the Romans took. He killed himſelf for fear of being taken. Flor. 2, c. 10.

ÆPY, a town of Elis, under the dominion of Neſtor. Stat. 4. Theb. v. 180.

ÆPŸTUS, king of Mycenæ, ſon of Chreſphontes and Merope, was educated in Arcadia with Cypſelus, his mother's father. To recover his kingdom, he killed Polyphontes, who had married his mother againſt her will, and uſurped the crown. Apollod. 2, c. 6.—Pauſ. 4, v. 3.——A king of Arcadia, ſon of Elatus.——A ſon of Hippothous, who forcibly entered the temple of Neptune, near Mantinea, and was ſtruck blind by the ſudden eruption of ſalt water from the altar. He was killed by a ſerpent in hunting. Pauſ. 8, c. 4 & 5.

ÆQUI or ÆQUICŎLI, a people of Latium, near Tybur; they were great enemies to Rome in its infant ſtate, and were conquered with much difficulty. Flor. 1, v. 11. Liv. 1, c. 32. l. 2, c. 30. l. 3, c. 2, &c. —Plin. 3, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 747. l. 9, v. 684.—Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 93.

ÆQUIMĔLIUM, a place in Rome where the houſe of Melius ſtood, who aſpired to ſovereign power. Liv. 4, c. 16.

ÆRIAS, an ancient king of Cyprus, who built the temple of Paphos. Tacit. Hiſt. 2, c. 3.

ÆRŎPE, wife of Atreus, committed adultery with Thyeſtes her brother-in-law, and had by him twins, who were placed as food before Atreus. Ovid. Triſt. 2, v. 391. ——A daughter of Cepheus, raviſhed by Mars. She died in child-bed; her child was preſerved, and called Æropus. Pauſ. 8, c. 44.

ÆRŎPUS, a general of Epirus, in the reign of Pyrrhus.——A perſon appointed regent to Oreſtes, the infant ſon of Archelaus king of Macedonia.——An officer of king Philip, baniſhed for bringing a finger into his camp. Polyæn. 4, c. 2.——A mountain of Chaonia. Liv. 31, c. 5.

ÆSĂCUS, a Trojan river near Ida.——A ſon of Priam, by Alexirhoe. He became enamoured of Heſperia, whom he purſued into the woods. The nymph threw herſelf into the ſea, and was changed into a bird. Æſacus followed her example, and was changed into a cormorant. Ovid. Met. 11. fab. 11.

ÆSĂPUS, a river of Myſia, in Aſia, falling into the Helleſpont. Plin. 5, c, 32.

ÆSAR, or ÆSĂRAS, a river of Magna Græcia, falling into the ſea near Crotona. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 28.

ÆSCHĪNES, an Athenian orator, who floriſhed about 342 B. C. and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his rivalſhip with Demoſthenes. His father's name was Atrometus, and he boaſted of his deſcent from a noble family, though Demoſthenes reproached him as being the ſon of a courtezan. The firſt open ſigns of enmity between the rival orators appeared at the court of Philip, where they were ſent as ambaſſadors; but the character of Æſchines was tarniſhed by the acceptance of a bribe from the Macedonian prince, whoſe tyranny had hitherto been the general ſubject of his declamation. When the Athenians wiſhed to reward the patriotic labors of Demoſthenes with a golden crown, Æſchines impeached Cteſiphon, who propoſed it; and to their ſubſequent diſpute we are indebted for the two celebrated orations de coronâ. Æſchines was defeated by his rival's ſuperior eloquence, and baniſhed to Rhodes; but as he retired from Athens, Demoſthenes ran after him, and nobly forced him to accept a preſent of ſilver. In his baniſhment, the orator repeated to the Rhodians, what he had delivered againſt Demoſthenes; and after receiving much applauſe, he was deſired to read the anſwer of his antagoniſt. It was received with greater marks of approbation; but, exclaimed Æſchines, how much more would your admiration have been raiſed, had you heard Demoſthenes himſelf ſpeak it! Æſchines died in the 75th year of his age, at Rhodes, or, as ſome ſuppoſe, at Samos. He wrote 3 orations, and 9 epiſtles, which, from their number, received the name, the firſt of the graces, and the laſt of the muſes. The orations alone are extant, generally found collected with thoſe of Lyſias. An oration which bears the name of Deliaca lex, is ſaid not to be his production, but that of Æſchines, another orator of that age. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 24. l. 2, c. 53. in Brut. c. 17.—Plut. in Demoſth.—Diog. 2 & 3.—Plin. 7, c. 30. Diogenes mentions ſeven more of the ſame name.——A philoſopher, diſciple of Socrates, who wrote ſeveral dialogues, ſome of which bore the following titles: Aſpaſia, Phædon, Alcibiades, Draco, Erycia, Polyænus, Telauges, &c. The dialogue intituled Axiochus, and aſcribed to Plato, is ſuppoſed to be his compoſition. The beſt edition is that of Leovard, 1718, with the notes of Horræus, in 8vo.——A man who wrote on oratory.——An Arcadian.——A Mitylenean.——A diſciple of Melanthius.—— A Mileſian writer.——A ſtatuary.

ÆSCHRION, a Mitylenean poet, intimate with Ariſtotle. He accompanied Alexander in his Aſiatic expedition.—An Iambic poet of Samos. Athen.—A phyſician commended by by Galen. A treatiſe of his on huſbandry has been quoted by Pliny.——A lieutenant of Archagathus, killed by Hanno. Diod. 20.

ÆSCHYLĪDES, a man who wrote a book on agriculture. Ælian. H. An. 15.

ÆSCHŸLUS, an excellent ſoldier and poet of Athens, ſon of Euphorion, and brother to Cynægirus. He was in the Athenian army at the battles of Marathon, Salamis, and Platæa. But the moſt ſolid fame he has obtained, is the offspring leſs of his valor in the field of battle than of his writings. Of ninety tragedies, however, the fruit of his ingenious labors, 40 of which were rewarded with the public prize, only ſeven have come ſafe to us: Prometheus vinctus, Septem duces apud Thebas, Perſæ, Agamemnon, Chæphori, Eumenides, Supplices. Æſchylus is the firſt who introduced two actors on the ſtage, and clothed them with dreſſes ſuitable to their character. He likewiſe removed murder from the ſtage. It is ſaid, that when he compoſed, his countenance betrayed the greateſt ferocity; and according to one of his ſcholiaſts, when his Eumenides were repreſented, many children died through fear, and ſeveral pregnant women actually miſcarried in the houſe, at the ſight of the horrible maſks that were introduced. The imagination of the poet was ſtrong and comprehenſive, but diſorderly and wild; fruitful in prodigies, but diſdaining probabilities. His ſtyle is obſcure, and the labors of an excellent modern critic, have pronounced him the moſt difficult of all the Greek claſſics. A few expreſſions of impious tendency in one of his plays, nearly proved fatal to Æſchylus; he was condemned to death: but his brother Amynias, it is reported, reverſed the ſentence, by uncovering an arm, of which the hand had been cut off at the battle of Salamis in the ſervice of his country, and the poet was pardoned. Æſchylus has been accuſed of drinking to exceſs, and of never compoſing except when in a ſtate of intoxication. In his old age, he retired to the court of Hiero in Sicily; and being informed that he was to die by the fall of a houſe, he retired from the city into the fields, where he ſat down. An eagle, with a tortoiſe in her bill, flew over his bald head, and ſuppoſing it to be a ſtone, dropped her prey upon it to break the ſhell, and Æſchylus inſtantly died of the blow, in the 69th year of his age, 456 B. C. It is ſaid that he wrote an account of the battle of Marathon, in elegiac verſes. The beſt editions of his works are thoſe of Starley, fol. London, 1663, and that of Glaſg. 2 vols. in 12mo, 1746. Horat. Art. Poet. 278.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Plin. 10, c. 3.—Val. Max. 9, c. 12.——The 12th perpetual archon of Athens.——A Corinthian, brother-in-law to Timophanes, intimate with Timoleon. Plut. in Timol.——A Rhodian ſet over Egypt with Peuceſtes of Macedonia. Curt. 4, c. 8.

ÆSCULĀPIUS, ſon of Apollo, by Coronis, or as ſome ſay, by Lariſſa daughter of Phlegias, was god of medicine. After his union with Coronis, Apollo ſet a crow to watch her, and was ſoon informed that ſhe admitted the careſſes of Iſchys, of Æmonia. The god, in a fit of anger, deſtroyed Coronis with lightening, but ſaved the infant from her womb, and gave him to be educated to Chiron, who taught him the art of medicine. Some authors ſay, that Coronis left her father to avoid the diſcovery of her pregnancy, and that ſhe expoſed her child near Epidaurus. A goat of the flocks of Areſthanas gave him her milk, and the dog who kept the flock ſtood by him to ſhelter him from injury. He was found by the maſter of the flock, who went in ſearch of his ſtray goat, and ſaw his head ſurrounded with reſplendent rays of light. Æſculapius was phyſician to the Argonauts. He reſtored many to life, of which Pluto complained to Jupiter, who ſtruck Æſculapius with thunder. Apollo, angry at the death of his ſon, killed the Cyclops who made the thunderbolts. Æſculapius received divine honors after death, chiefly at Epidaurus, Pergamus, Athens, Smyrna, &c. Goats, bulls, lambs, and pigs, were ſacrificed to him, and the cock and the ſerpent were ſacred to him. Rome A. U. C. 462, was delivered of a plague, and built a temple to the god of medicine, who, as was ſuppoſed, had come there in the form of a ſerpent, and hid himſelf among the reeds in an iſland of the Tyber. Æſculapius is repreſented with a large beard, holding in his hand a ſtaff, round which is wreathed a ſerpent; his other hand is ſometimes ſupported on the head of a ſerpent. Serpents are more particularly ſacred to him, as the ancient phyſicians uſed them in their preſcriptions. He married Epione, by whom he had two ſons, famous for their ſkill in medicine, Machaon and Podalirus; and four daughters, of whom Hygiea, goddeſs of health, is the moſt celebrated. Some have ſuppoſed that he lived a ſhort time after the Trojan war. Heſiod makes no mention of him. Homer. Il. 4, v. 193. Hymn. in Æſcul.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Apollon. 4, Argon.—Hygin. fab. 49.—Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 8.—Pauſ. 2, c. 11 & 27. l. 7, c. 23, &c.—Diod. 4.—Pindar. Pyth. 3.—*Lucian. ÆSĒPUS, a ſon of Bucolion. Homer. Il. 6, c. 21.—A river. Vid. Æſapus.

Æsernia, a city of the Samnites, in Italy. Liv. 27, c. 12.—Sil. 8, v. 567.

Æsion, an Athenian, famous for his reſpect for the talents of Demoſthenes. Plut. in Demoſth.

Æson, ſon of Cretheus, was born at the ſame birth as Pelias. He ſucceeded his father in the kingdom of Iolchos, but was ſoon exiled by his brother. He married Alcimeda, by whom he had Jaſon, whoſe education he entruſted to Chiron, being afraid of Pelias. When Jaſon was grown up, he demanded his father's kingdom from his uncle, who gave him evaſive anſwers, and perſuaded him to go in queſt of the golden fleece. [Vid. Jaſon.] At his return, Jaſon found his father very infirm; and Medea, [Vid. Medea.] at his requeſt, drew the blood from Æſon's veins, and refilled them with the juice of certain herbs which ſhe had gathered, and immediately the old man recovered the vigor and bloom of youth. Some ſay that Æſon killed himſelf by drinking bull's blood, to avoid the perſecution of Pelias. Diod. 4.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 285.—Hygin. fab. 12.——A river of Theſſaly, with a town of the ſame name.

Æsŏnĭdes, a patronymic of Jaſon, as being deſcended from Æſon.

Æsŏpus, a Phrygian philoſopher, who, though originally a ſlave, procured his liberty by the ſallies of his genius. He travelled over the greateſt part of Greece and Egypt, but chiefly reſided at the court of Crœſus, king of Lydia, by whom he was ſent to conſult the oracle of Delphi. In this commiſſion Æſop behaved with great ſeverity, and ſatirically compared the Delphians to floating ſticks, which appear large at a diſtance, but are nothing when brought near. The Delphians, offended with his ſarcaſtic remarks, accuſed him of having ſecreted one of the ſacred veſſels of Apollo's temple, and threw him down from a rock, 561 B. C. Maximus Planudes has written his life in Greek; but no credit is to be given to the biographer, who falſely aſſerts that the mythologiſt was ſhort and deformed. Æſop dedicated his fables to his patron Crœſus; but what appears, now under his name, is no doubt a compilation of all the fables and apologues of wits before and after the age of Æſop, conjointly with his own. Plut. in Solon.—Phæd. 1, fab. 2. l. 2, fab. 9.—— Claudus, an actor on the Roman ſtage, very intimate with Cicero. He amaſſed an immenſe fortune. His ſon, to be more expenſive, melted precious ſtones to drink at his entertainments. Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 239. —*Val. Æstria, an iſland in the Adriatic. Mela 2, c. 7.

Æsŭla, a town on a mountain between Tybur and Prænesſte. Horat. 3, od. 29.

Æsyetes, a man from whoſe tomb Polites ſpied what the Greeks did in their ſhips during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2, v. 793.

Æsymnētes, a ſirname of Bacchus. Paſ. 7, c. 21.

Æsymnus, a perſon of Megara, who conſulted Apollo to know the beſt method of governing his country. Pauſ. 1, c. 43.

Æthalĭdes, a herald, ſon of Mercury, to whom it was granted to be amongſt the dead and the living at ſtated times. Apollon. Argon. 1.

Æthiōpia, an extenſive country of Africa, at the ſouth of Egypt, divided into eaſt and weſt by the ancients, the former diviſion lying near Meroe, and the latter near the Mauri. The country, as well as the inhabitants, were little known to the ancients, though Homer has ſtyled them the juſteſt of men. Diod. 4, ſays, that the Æthiopians were the firſt inhabitants of the earth. They were the firſt who worſhipped the gods, for which, as ſome ſuppoſe, their country has never been invaded by a foreign enemy. The inhabitants are of a dark complexion. The country is inundated for five months every year, and their days and nights are almoſt of an equal length. The ancients have given the name of Æthiopia to every country whoſe inhabitants are of a black colour. Lucan. 3, v. 253. l. 9, v. 651.—Juv. 2, v. 23.—Plin. 6, c. 29.—Pauſ. 1, c. 33.—Homer. Od. 1, v. 22.

Æthlius, ſon of Jupiter by Protogenia, was father of Endymion. Apollod. 1, c. 7.

Æthon, a horſe of the ſun. Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 1.——A horſe of Pallas, repreſented as ſhedding tears at the death of his maſter, by Virg. Æn. 11, v. 89.——A horſe of Hector. Homer. Il. 8, v. 185.

Æthra, daughter of Pittheus king of Trœzene, had Theſeus by Ægeus. [Vid. Ægeus.] She was carried away by Caſtor and Pollux, when they recovered their ſiſter Helen, whom Theſeus had ſtolen, and given her to keep. [Vid. Helen.] She went to Troy with Helen. *Homer. Æthūsa, a daughter of Neptune by Amphitrite. Pauſ. 9, c. 20.——An iſland near Lilybæum. Plin. 3, c. 8.

Ætia, a poem of Callimachus, in which he he ſpeaks of ſacrifices, and of the manner in which they were offered. Mart. 10, ep. 4.

Ætion, the father of Andromache, Hector's wife. He was killed at Thebes, with his ſeven ſons, by the Greeks.——A famous painter. He drew a painting of Alexander going to celebrate his nuptials with Roxane. This piece was much valued, and was expoſed to public view at the Olympic games, where it gained ſo much applauſe that the preſident of the games gave the painter his daughter in marriage.

Ætna, a mountain of Sicily, now called Mount Gibel, famous for its vulcano, which, for more than 3000 years, has thrown out fire at intervals. It is ſuppoſed to be 8 miles high, and 60 in compaſs. Its top is covered with ſnow and ſmoke at the ſame time; and the ſides, on account of the fecundity of the ſoil, are carefully cultivated and planted with vineyards. The poets ſuppoſed that Jupiter had confined the giants under this mountain. It was the forge of Vulcan, where his ſervants the Cyclops fabricated thunderbolts, &c. Heſiod. Theog. v. 860.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 570.—Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 6. l. 15, v. 340.—Ital. 14, v. 59.

Ætōlia, a country bounded by Epirus, Acarnania, and Locris, ſuppoſed to be about the middle of Greece. It received its name from Ætolus. The inhabitants were covetous and illiberal. Liv. 26, c. 24, &c.—Flor. 2, c. 9.—Strab. 8 & 10.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Plin. 4, c. 2.—Pauſ. 10, c. 18.—Plut. in Flam.

Ætōlus, ſon of Endymion of Elis and Iphianaſſa, married Pronoe, by whom he had Pleuron and Calydon. Having accidentally killed a perſon, he left his country, and came to ſettle in that part of Greece which has been called, from him, Ætolia. Apollod. 1, c. 7 & 9.—Pauſ. 5, c. 1.

Æx, a rocky iſland between Tenedos and Chios. Plin. 4, c. 11.——A city in the country of the Marſi.——The nurſe of Jupiter, changed into a conſtellation.

Afer, an inhabitant of Africa.——An informer under Tiberius and his ſucceſſors. He became alſo known as an orator, and as the preceptor of Quintilian, and was made conſul by Domitian. He died A. D. 59.

Afrānia, a Roman matron who frequented the forum, forgetful of female decency. Val. Max. 9, c. 3.

Afrānius, a Latin comic poet, often compared to Menander. He lived in the age of Terence. He is blamed for the unnatural love of boys, which he mentions in his writings, ſome fragments of which are to be found in the Corpus Poetarum. Quint. 10, c. 1.—Sueton. Ner. 11.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 57.——A general of Pompey, conquered by Cæſar in Spain. Sueton. in Cæſ. 34.—Plut. in Pomp.——Q. a man who wrote a ſevere ſatyr againſt Nero, for which he was put to death in the Piſonian conſpiracy. Tacit.——Potitus, a plebeian, who ſaid before Caligula, that he would willingly die if he (Caligula) could recover from the diſtemper he labored under. The emperor recovered, and Afranius was put to death that he might not forfeit his word. Dio.

Africa, called Libya by the Greeks, one of the three parts of the ancient world, and the greateſt peninſula of the univerſe, was bounded on the eaſt by Arabia and the Red Sea, on the north by the Mediterranean, ſouth and weſt by the ocean. It is joined on the eaſt to Aſia, by an iſthmus 60 miles long, which ſome of the Ptolemies endeavoured to cut, in vain, to join the Red and Mediterranean ſeas. It is ſo immediately ſituate under the ſun, that only the maritime parts are inhabited, and the inland country is barren and ſandy, and infeſted with wild beaſts. The ancients, through ignorance, peopled the ſouthern parts of Africa with monſters, enchanters, and chimeras; errors which begin to be corrected by modern travellers. Mela. 1, c. 4, &c.—Diod. 3, 4, & 20.—Herodot. 2, c. 17, 26, & 32. l. 4, c. 41, &c.—Plin. 5, c. 1, &c.——There is a part of Africa, called Propria, which lies about the middle, and has Carthage for its capital.

Africānus, a blind poet, commended by Ennius.——A chriſtian writer, who floriſhed A. D. 222. In his chronicle, which was univerſally eſteemed, he reckoned 5500 from the creation of the world to the age of Julius Cæſar. Nothing remains of this work, but what Euſebius has preſerved. In a letter to Origen, Africanus proved, that the hiſtory of Suſannah is ſuppoſititious; and in another to Ariſtides, ſtill extant, he endeavours to reconcile the ſeeming contradictions that appear in the genealogies of Chriſt in St. Matthew and Luke. He is ſuppoſed to be the ſame who wrote nine books, in which he treats of phyſic, agriculture, &c.—A lawyer, diſciple to Papinian, and intimate with the emperor Alexander.—An orator mentioned by Quintilian.——The ſirname of the Scipios, from the conqueſt of Africa. Vid. Scipio.

Africum mare, is that part of the Mediterranean which is on the coaſt of Africa.

Agăgriānæ portæ, gates at Syracuſe, near which the dead were buried. Cic. in Tuſc.

Agalasses, a nation of India, conquered by Alexander. Diod. 17.

Agalla, a woman of Corcyra, who wrote a treatiſe upon grammar. Athen. 1.

AGAMĒDES and TROPHONIUS, two architects who made the entrance of the temple of Delphi, for which they demanded of the god, whatever gift was moſt advantageous for a man to receive. Three days after, they were found dead in their bed. Plut. de conſ. ad Apol.—Cic. Tuſc. 1, c. 47.—Pauſ. 9, c. 11 & 37, gives a different account.

AGAMEMNON, king of Mycenæ and Argos, was brother to Menelaus, and ſon of Pliſthenes, the ſon of Atreus. Homer calls them ſons of Atreus, which is falſe, upon the authority of Heſiod, Apollod. &c. [Vid. Pliſthenes.] When Atreus was dead, his brother Thyeſtes ſeized the kingdom of Argos, and removed Agamemnon and Menelaus, who fled to Polyphidus king of Sicyon, and hence to Œneus, king of Ætolia, where they were educated. Agamemnon married Clytemneſtra, and Menelaus Helen, both daughters of Tyndarus king of Sparta, who aſſiſted them to recover their father's kingdom, where Agamemnon eſtabliſhed himſelf, at Mycenæ. Menelaus ſucceeded his father-in-law. When Helen was ſtolen by Paris, Agamemnon was elected commander in chief of the Grecian forces going againſt Troy. Their fleet was detained at Aulis, where Agamemnon ſacrificed his daughter to appeaſe Diana. [Vid. Iphigenia.] During the Trojan war, Agamemnon behaved with much valor; but his quarrel with Achilles, whoſe miſtreſs he took by force, was fatal to the Greeks. [Vid. Briſeis.] After the ruin of Troy, Caſſandra fell to his ſhare, and foretold him that his wife would put him to death. He gave no credit to this, and returned to Argos with Caſſandra. Clytemneſtra, with her adulterer Ægiſthus, [Vid. Ægiſthus.] prepared to murder him; and as he came from the bath, to embarraſs him, ſhe gave him a tunic whoſe ſleeves were ſewed together, and while he attempted to put it on, ſhe brought him to the ground with the ſtroke of a hatchet, and Ægiſthus ſeconded her blows. His death was revenged by his ſon Oreſtes. [Vid. Clytemneſtra, Menelaus and Oreſtes.] Homer Il. 1, 2, &c. Od. 4, &c.—*Ovid. de Rem. AGESILĀUS, king of Sparta, of the family of the Agidæ, was ſon of Doryſſus, and father of Archelaus. During his reign, Lycurgus inſtituted his famous laws. Herodot. 7, c. 204.—Pauſ. 3, c. 2.——Son of Archidamus of the family of the Proclidæ, in preference to his nephew Leotychides. He made war againſt Artaxerxes king of Perſia with ſucceſs; but in the midſt of his conqueſts conqueſts in Aſia, he was recalled home to oppoſe the Athenians and Bœotians, who deſolated his country; and on his return, he paſſed, in thirty days, over that tract of country which had taken up a whole year of Xerxes' expedition. He defeated his enemies at Coronea; but ſickneſs prevented the progreſs of his conqueſts, and the Spartans were beat in every engagement, eſpecially at Leuctra, till he appeared at their head. Though deformed, ſmall of ſtature, and lame, he was brave, and a greatneſs of ſoul compenſated all the imperfections of nature. He was as fond of ſobriety as of military diſcipline; and when he went, in his 80th year, to aſſiſt Tachus king of Egypt, the ſervants of the monarch could hardly be perſuaded that the Lacedæmonian general was eating with his ſoldiers on the ground, bare-headed, and without any covering underneath. Ageſilaus died on his return from Egypt, after a reign of 36 years, 362 B. C. and his remains were embalmed and brought to Lacedæmon. Juſtin. 6, c. 1.—Plut. & *C. AGRARIA LEX was enacted to diſtribute among the Roman people, all the lands which the Romans had gained by conqueſt. It was firſt propoſed A. U. C. 267, by the conſul Sp. Caſſius Vicellinus, and rejected by the ſenate. This produced diſſentions between the ſenate and the people, and Caſſius, upon ſeeing the ill ſucceſs of the new regulations he propoſed, offered to diſtribute among the people, the money which was produced from the corn of Sicily, after it had been brought and ſold in Rome. This act of liberality the people refuſed, and tranquillity was ſoon after re-eſtabliſhed in the ſtate. It was propoſed a ſecond time A. U. C. 269, by the tribune Licinius Stolo, but with no better ſucceſs; and ſo great were the tumults which followed, that one of the tribunes of the people was killed, and many of the ſenators fined for their oppoſition. Mutius Scævola, A. U. C. 320, perſuaded the tribune Tiberius Gracchus to propoſe it a third time; and though Octavius, his colleague in the tribuneſhip, oppoſed it, yet Tiberius made it paſs into a law, after much altercation, and commiſſioners were authoriſed to make a diviſion of the lands.—This law at laſt proved fatal to the freedom of Rome under J. Cæſar. Flor. 3, c. 3 & 13.—Cic. pro Leg. Agr.—Liv. 2, c. 41.

AGRIŌPE, the wife of king Agenor.

M. AGRIPPA VIPSANIUS, a celebrated Roman, who obtained a victory over S. Pompey, and favored the cauſe of Auguſtus at the battles of Actium and Philippi, where he behaved with great valor. He adviſed his friend to re-eſtabliſh the republican government at Rome, but he was over-ruled by Mecænas. In his expeditions in Gaul and Germany he obtained ſeveral victories, but refuſed the honors of a triumph, and turned his liberality towards the embelliſhing of Rome, and the raiſing of magnificent buildings, one of which, the Pantheon, ſtill exiſts. After he had retired for two years to Mitylene, in conſequence of a quarrel with Marcellus, Auguſtus recalled him, and as a proof of his regard, gave him his daughter Julia in marriage, and left him the care of the empire during an abſence of two years employed in viſiting the Roman provinces of Greece and Aſia. He died univerſally lamented at Rome in the 51ſt year of his age, 12 B. C. and his body was placed in the tomb which Auguſtus had prepared for himſelf. He had been married three times, to Pomponia daughter of Atticus, to Marcella daughter of Octavia, and to Julia, by whom he had five children, Caius, and Lucius Cæſares, Poſthumus Agrippa, Agrippina, and Julia. His ſon, C. Cæſar Agrippa, was adopted by Auguſtus, and made conſul, by the flattery of the Roman people, at the age of 14 or 15. This promiſing youth went to Armenia, on an expedition againſt the Perſians, where he received a fatal blow from the treacherous hand of Lollius, the governor of one of the neighbouring cities. He languiſhed for a little time, and died in Lycia. His younger brother, L. Cæſar Agrippa, was likewiſe adopted by his grandfather Auguſtus; but he was ſoon after baniſhed to Campania, for uſing ſeditious language againſt his benefactor. In the 7th year of his exile he would have been recalled, had not Livia and Tiberius, jealous of the partiality of Auguſtus for him, ordered him to be aſſaſſinated, in his 26th year. He has been called ferocious and ſavage; and he gave himſelf the name of Neptune, becauſe he was fond of fiſhing.——Sylvius, a ſon of Tiberinus Sylvius, king of Latium. He reigned 33 years, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Remulus Sylvius. Dionyſ. Hal. 1. c. 8.——One of the ſervants of the murdered prince aſſumed his name, and raiſed commotions. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 39.——A conſul who conquered the Æqui.——A philoſopher. Diog.——A ſon of Ariſtobulus, grandſon of the Great Herod, who became tutor to the grand-child of Tiberius, and was ſoon after impriſoned by the ſuſpicious tyrant. When Caligula aſcended the throne, his favorite was releaſed, preſented with a chain of gold as heavy as that which had lately confined him, and made king of Judæa. He was a popular character with the Jews; and it is ſaid, that while they were flattering him with the appellation of god, an angel of God ſtruck him with the louſy diſeaſe, of which he died, A. D. 43. His ſon, of the ſame name, was the laſt king of the Jews, deprived of his kingdom by Claudius, in exchange for other provinces. He was with Titus at the celebrated ſiege of Jeruſalem, and died A. D. 94. It was before him that St. Paul pleaded, and made mention of his inceſtuous commerce with his ſiſter Berenice. Juv. 6, v. 156.—Tacit. 2 hiſt. c. 81.——Menenius, a Roman general, who obtained a triumph over the Sabines, appeaſed the populace of Rome by the well-known fable of the belly and the limbs, and erected the new office of tribunes of the people, A. U. C. 261. He died poor, but univerſally regretted; his funeral was at the expence of the public, from which alſo his daughters received dowries. Liv. 2, c. 32.—Flor. 1, c. 23.——A mathematician in the reign of Domitian; he was a native of Bithynia.

AGRIPPINA, a wife of Tiberius. The emperor repudiated her to marry Julia. Sueton. in Tib. 7.——A daughter of M. Agrippa, and grand-daughter to Auguſtus. She married Germanicus, whom ſhe accompanied in Syria; and when Piſo poiſoned him, ſhe carried his aſhes to Italy, and accuſed his murderer, who ſtabbed himſelf. She fell under the diſpleaſure of Tiberius, who exiled her in an iſland, where ſhe died, A. D. 26, for want of bread. She left nine children, and was diſtinguiſhed all her life for intrepidity and conjugal affection. Tac. 1, Ann. c. 2. &c.—Sueton in Tib. 52.——Julia, daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, married Domitius Ænobarbus, by whom ſhe had Nero. After her huſband's death, ſhe married her uncle the emperor Claudius, whom ſhe deſtroyed, to make Nero ſucceed to the throne. After many cruelties, ſies, and much licentiouſneſs, ſhe was aſſaſſinated by order of her ſon, and as ſhe expired, ſhe exclaimed, "ſtrike the belly which could give birth to ſuch a monſter." She died A. D. 59, after a life of proſtitution and inceſtuous gratifications. It is ſaid that her ſon viewed her dead body with all the raptures of admiration, ſaying, he never could have believed his mother was ſo beautiful a woman. She left memoirs which aſſiſted Tacitus in the compoſition of his annals. The town which ſhe built, where ſhe was born, on the borders of the Rhine, and called Agrippina Colonia, is the modern Cologne. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 75. l. 12, c. 7, 22, &c.

AHĀLA, the ſirname of the Servilii at Rome.

AHENOBARBUS. Vid. Ænobarbus.

AJAX, ſon of Telamon by Periboea or Eriboea daughter of Alcathous, was the braveſt of all the Greeks in the Trojan war after Achilles. He engaged Hector, with whom at parting he exchanged arms. After the death of Achilles, Ajax and Ulyſſes diſputed their claim to the arms of the dead hero. When they were given to the latter, Ajax was ſo enraged, that he ſlaughtered a whole flock of ſheep, ſuppoſing them to be the ſons of Atreus, who had given the preference to Ulyſſes, and ſtabbed himſelf with his ſword. The blood which run to the ground from the wound, was changed into the flower hyacinth. Some ſay that he was killed by Paris in battle, others, that he was murdered by Ulyſſes. His body was buried at Sigæum, ſome ſay on mount Rhœtus. His tomb was viſited by Alexander. Hercules, according to ſome authors, prayed to the gods that his friend Telamon, who was childleſs, might have a ſon, with a ſkin as impenetrable as the ſkin of the Nemæan lion, which he then wore. His prayers were heard; and when Ajax was born, Hercules wrapped him up in the lion's ſkin, which rendered his body invulnerable, except that part which was left uncovered by a hole in the ſkin, through which Hercules hung his quiver. This vulnerable part was in his breaſt, ſome ſay behind the neck. Q. Calab. 1 & 4.—Apollod. 3, c. 10 & 13. Philoſtr. in Heroic. c. 12.—Pindar. Iſthm. 6. Homer. Il. 1, &c. Od. 11.—*Dictys. He went with 40 ſhips to the Trojan war, as being one of Helen's ſuitors. The night that Troy was taken, he offered violence to Caſſandra, who fled into Minerva's temple; and for this, as he returned home, the goddeſs, who had obtained the thunders of Jupiter, and the power of tempeſts from Neptune, deſtroyed his ſhip in a ſtorm. Ajax ſwam to a rock, and ſaid that he

he was ſafe in ſpite of all the gods. Such impiety offended Neptune, who ſtruck the rock with his trident, and Ajax tumbled into the ſea with part of the rock, and was drowned. His body was afterwards found by the Greeks, and black ſheep offered on his tomb. According to Virgil's account, Minerva ſeized him in a whirlwind, and daſhed him againſt a rock, where he expired, conſumed by thunder. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 43, &c.—*Homer. ALBĪNUS, was born at Adrumetum in Africa, and made governor of Britain, by Commodus. After the murder of Pertinax, he was elected emperor by the ſoldiers in Britain. Severus had alſo been inveſted with the imperial dignity by his own army; and theſe two rivals, with about 50,000 men each, came into Gaul to decide the fate of the empire. Severus was conqueror, and he ordered the head of Albinus to be cut off, and his body to be thrown into the Rhone. A. D. 198. Albinus, according to the exaggerated account of a certain writer called Codrus, was famous for his voracious appetite, and ſometimes eat for breakfaſt, no leſs than 500 figs, 100 peaches, 20 pounds of dry raiſins, 10 melons, and 400 oyſters.——A pretorian ſent to Sylla, as ambaſſador from the Senate during the civil wars. ALCENOR, an Argive, who alone with Chromius ſurvived the battle between 300 of his countrymen and 300 Lacedæmonians. Herodot. 1, c. 82.

ALCESTE, or ALCESTIS, daughter of Pelias, married Admetus. She, with her ſiſters, put to death her father, that he might be reſtored to youth and vigor by Medea, who, however, refuſed to perform her promiſe. Upon this, the ſiſters fled to Admetus, who married Alceſte. They were ſoon purſued by an army headed by their brother Acaſtus; and Admetus being taken priſoner, was redeemed from death, by the generous offer of his wife, who was ſacrificed in his ſtead to appeaſe the ſhades of her father. Some ſay that Alceſte laid down her life for her huſband, when ſhe had been told by an oracle, that he could never recover from a diſeaſe if none of his friends died in his place. According to ſome authors, Hercules brought her back from hell. She had many ſuitors while ſhe lived with her father. Vid. Admetus. Juv. 6, v. 651.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Paus. 5, c. 17.—Hygin. fab. 251.—Eurip. in Alceſt.

ALCHIMĂCHUS, a celebrated painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.

ALCIBIĂDES, an Athenian general, famous for his enterpriſing ſpirit, verſatile genius, and natural foibles. He was diſciple to Socrates, whoſe leſſons and example checked, for a while, his vicious propenſities. In the Peloponneſian wars he encouraged the Athenians to make an expedition againſt Syracuſe. He was choſen general in that war, and in his abſence, his enemies accuſed him of impiety, and confiſcated his goods. Upon this he fled, ſtirred up the Spartans to make war againſt Athens; and when this did not ſucceed, he retired to Tiſſaphernes, the Perſian general. Being recalled by the Athenians, he obliged the Lacedæmonians to ſue for peace, made ſeveral conqueſts in Aſia, and was received in triumph at Athens. His popularity was of ſhort duration; the failure of an expedition againſt Cyme, expoſed him again to the reſentment of the people, and he fled to Pharnabazus, whom he almoſt induced to make war upon Lacedæmon. This was told to Lyſander, the Spartan general, who prevailed upon Pharnabazus to murder Alcibiades. Two ſervants were ſent for that purpoſe, and they ſet on fire the cottage where he was, and killed him with darts as he attempted to make his eſcape. He died in the 46th year of his age, 404 B. C. after a life of perpetual difficulties. If the fickleneſs of his countrymen had known how to retain among them the talents of a man who diſtinguiſhed himſelf, and was admired wherever he went, they might have riſen to greater ſplendor, and to the ſovereignty of Greece. His character has been cleared from the aſperſions of malevolence, by the writings of Thucydides, Timæus, and Theopompus; and he is known to us as a hero, who, to the principles of the debauchee, added the intelligence and ſagacity of the ſtateſman, the cool intrepidity of the general, and the humanity of the philoſopher. Plut. & C. Nep. in Alcib.—Thucyd. 5, 6, & 7.—Xenoph. Hiſt. Græc. 1, &c.—Diod. 12.

ALCMÆON, was ſon of the prophet Amphiaraus and Eriphyle. His father going to the Theban war, where he was to periſh, charged him to revenge his death upon Eriphyle, who had betrayed him. [Vid. Eriphyle.] As ſoon as he heard of his father's death, he murdered his mother, for which crime the furies perſecuted him till Phlegeus purified him and gave him his daughter Alphesibœa in marriage. Alcmæon gave her the fatal collar which his mother had received to betray his father, and afterwards divorced her, and married Callirhoe the daughter of Achelous, to whom he promiſed the necklace he had given to Alphesibœa. When he attempted to recover it, Alphesibœa's brothers murdered him on account of the treatment he had given their ſiſter, and left his body a prey to wild beaſts. Alcmæon's children by Callirhoe revenged their father's death by killing his murderers. [*Vid. ALCMAN, a very ancient Lyric poet, born in Sardinia, and not at Lacedæmon, as ſome ſuppoſe. He wrote in the Doric dialect, 6 books of verſes, beſides a play called Co'ymboſas. He floriſhed B. C. 670, and died of the louſy diſeaſe. Pauſ. 1, c. 41. l. 3, c. 15.—Ariſtot Hiſt. Anim. 5, c. 31.

ALCMĒNA, was daughter of Electrion king of Argos, by Anaxo, whom Plut. de reb. Græc. calls Lyſidice, and Diod. l. 2, Eurymede. Her father promiſed his crown and his daughter to Amphitryon, if he would revenge the death of his ſons, who had been all killed, except Licymnius, by the Teleboans a people of Ætolia. While Amphitryon was gone againſt the Ætolians, Jupiter, who was enamoured of Alcmena, reſolved to introduce himſelf into her bed. The more effectually to inſure ſucceſs in his amour, he aſſumed the form of Amphitryon, declared that he had obtained a victory over Alcmena's enemies, and even preſented her with a cup, which he ſaid he had preſerved from the ſpoils for her ſake. Alcmena yielded to her lover what ſhe had promiſed to her future huſband; and Jupiter, to delay the return of Amphitryon, ordered his meſſenger, Mercury, to ſtop the riſing of Phœbus, or the ſun, ſo that the night he paſſed with Alcmena was prolonged to three long nights. Amphitryon returned the next day; and after complaining of the coldneſs with which he was received, Alcmena acquainted him with the reception of a falſe lover the preceding night, and even ſhowed him the cup which ſhe had received. Amphitryon was perplexed at the relation, and more ſo upon miſſing the cup from among his ſpoils. He went to the prophet Tireſias, who told him of Jupiter's intrigue; and he returned to his wife, proud of the dignity of his rival. Alcmena became pregnant by Jupiter, and afterwards by her huſband; and when ſhe was going to bring forth, Jupiter boaſted in heaven, that a child was to be born that day, to whom he would give abſolute power over his neighbours, and even over all the children of his own blood. Juno, who was jealous of Jupiter's amours with Alcmena, made him ſwear by the Styx, and immediately prolonged the travails of Alcmena, and haſtened the bringing forth of the wife of Sthenelus king of Argos, who, after a pregnancy of ſeven months, had a ſon called Euryſtheus. Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 5, &c. ſays, that Juno was aſſiſted by Lucina to put off the bringing forth of Alcmena, and that Lucina, in the form of an old woman, ſat before the door of Amphitryon with her legs and arms croſſed. This poſture was the cauſe of infinite torment to Alcmena, till her ſervant, Galanthis, ſuppoſing the old woman to be a witch, and to be the cauſe of the pains of her miſtreſs, told her that ſhe had brought forth. Lucina retired from her poſture, and immediately Alcmena brought forth twins, Hercules conceived by Jupiter, and Iphiclus by Amphitryon. Euryſtheus was already born, and therefore Hercules was ſubjected to his power. After Amphitryon's death, Alcmena married Rhadamanthus, and retired to Ocalea in Bœotia. This marriage, according to ſome authors, was celebrated in the iſland of Leuce. The people of Megara ſaid that ſhe had been buried in the temple of Jupiter Olympius. Pauſ. 1, c. 41. l. 5, c. 18. l. 9, c. 16.—Plut. in Theſ. & Romul.—Homer Od. 11. Il. 19—Pindar Pyth. 9.—*Lucian Dial. ALEXAMĒNUS, an Ætolian, who killed Nabis, tyrant of Lacedæmon. He was ſoon after murdered by the people. Liv. 35, c. 34.

ALEXANDER Iſt, ſon of Amyntas, was the tenth king of Macedonia. He killed the Perſian ambaſſadors for their immodeſt behaviour to the women of his father's court, and was the firſt who raiſed the reputation of the Macedonians. He reigned 43 years, and died 451 B. C. Juſtin. 7, c. 3.—Herodot. 5, 7, 8 & 9.

ALEXANDER 2d, ſon of Amyntas 2d, king of Macedonia, was treacherouſly murdered, B. C. 370, by his younger brother Ptolemy, who held the kingdom for four years, and made way for Perdiccas and Philip. Juſtin. 7, c. 5.

ALEXANDER 3d, ſurnamed the Great, was ſon of Philip and Olympias. He was born B. C. 355, on that night in which the famous temple of Diana at Epheſus was burnt by Eroſtratus. This event, according to the magicians, was an early prognoſtic of his future greatneſs, as well as the taming of Bucephalus, a horſe whom none of the king's courtiers could manage; upon which Philip ſaid with tears in his eyes, that his ſon muſt ſeek another kingdom, as that of Macedonia would would not be ſufficiently large for the diſplay of his greatneſs. Olympias during her pregnancy declared, that ſhe was with child by a dragon; and the day that Alexander was born, two eagles perched for ſome time on the houſe of Philip, as if foretelling that his ſon would become maſter of Europe and Aſia. He was pupil to Ariſtotle during five years, and he received his learned preceptor's inſtructions with much deference and pleaſure, and always reſpected his abilities. When Philip went to war, Alexander, in his 15th year, was left governor of Macedonia, where he quelled a dangerous ſedition, and ſoon after followed his father to the field, and ſaved his life in a battle. He was highly offended when Philip divorced Olympias to marry Cleopatra, and even cauſed the death of Attalus, the new queen's brother. After this he retired from court to his mother Olympias, but was recalled; and when Philip was aſſaſſinated, he puniſhed his murderers; and, by his prudence and moderation, gained the affections of his ſubjects. He conquered Thrace and Illyricum, and deſtroyed Thebes; and after he had been choſen chief commander of all the forces of Greece, he declared war againſt the Perſians, who under Darius and Xerxes had laid waſte and plundered ſome of the Grecian cities. With 32,000 foot and 5,000 horſe, he invaded Aſia, and after the defeat of Darius at the Granicus, he conquered all the provinces of Aſia Minor. He obtained two other celebrated victories over Darius at Iſſus and Arbela, took Tyre after an obſtinate ſiege of ſeven months, and the ſlaughter of 2000 of the inhabitants in cool blood, and made himſelf maſter of Egypt, Media, Syria, and Perſia. From Egypt he viſited the temple of Jupiter Ammon, and bribed the prieſts, who ſaluted him as the ſon of their god, and enjoined his army to pay divine honors to him. He built a town which he called Alexandria, in the moſt eligible ſituation on the weſtern ſide of the Nile, near the coaſt of the Mediterranean. His conqueſts were extended in India, where he fought with Porus, a powerful king of the country; and after he had invaded Scythia, and viſited the Indian ocean, he retired to Babylon, loaded with the ſpoils of the eaſt. His entering the city was foretold by the magicians as fatal, and their prediction was fulfilled. He died at Babylon the 21ſt of April, in the 32d year of his age, after a reign of 12 years and 8 months of continual ſucceſs, 323 B. C. His death was ſo premature that ſome have attributed it to the effects of poiſon, and exceſs of drinking. Antipater has been accuſed of cauſing the fatal poiſon to be given him at a feaſt; and perhaps the reſentment of the Macedonians, whoſe ſervices he ſeemed to forget, by entruſting the guard of his body to the Perſians, was the cauſe of his death. He was ſo univerſally regretted, that Babylon was filled with tears and lamentations; and the Medes and Macedonians declared, that no one was able or worthy to ſucceed him. Many conſpiracies were formed againſt him by the officers of his army, but they were all ſeaſonably ſuppreſſed. His tender treatment of the wife and mother of king Darius, who were taken priſoners, has been greatly praiſed; and the latter, who had ſurvived the death of her ſon, killed herſelf when ſhe heard that Alexander was dead. His great intrepidity more than once endangered his life; he always fought as if ſure of victory, and the terror of his name was often of more effect than his arms. He was always forward in every engagement, and bore the labors of the field as well as the meaneſt of his ſoldiers. During his conqueſts in Aſia, he founded many cities, which he called Alexandria, after his own name. When he had conquered Darius, he ordered himſelf to be worſhipped as a god; and Calliſthenes, who refuſed to do it, was ſhamefully put to death. He murdered, at a banquet, his friend Clitus, who had once ſaved his life in a battle, becauſe he enlarged upon the virtues and exploits of Philip, and preferred them to thoſe of his ſon. His victories and ſucceſs encreaſed his pride; he dreſſed himſelf in the Perſian manner, and gave himſelf up to pleaſure and diſſipation. He ſet on fire the town of Perſepolis, in a fit of madneſs and intoxication, encouraged by the courtezan Thais. Yet among all his extravagancies, he was fond of candor and of truth; and when one of his officers read to him, as he ſailed on the Hydaſpes, an hiſtory which he had compoſed of the wars with Porus, and in which he had too liberally panegyrized him, Alexander ſnatched the book from his hand, and threw it into the river, ſaying, "what need is there of ſuch flattery? are not the exploits of Alexander ſufficiently meritorious in themſelves, without the colorings of falſehood?" He in like manner rejected a ſtatuary, who offered to cut mount Athos like him, and repreſent him as holding a town in one hand, and pouring a river from the other. He forbade any ſtatuary to make his ſtatue except Lyſippus, and any painter to draw his picture except Apelles. On his death-bed he gave his ring to Perdiccas, and it was ſuppoſed that by this ſingular preſent, he wiſhed to make him his ſucceſſor. Some time before his death, his officers aſked him whom he appointed to ſucceed him on the throne? and he anſwered, the worthieſt among you; but I am afraid, added he, my beſt friends will perform my funeral obſequies with bloody hands. Alexander, with all his pride, was humane and liberal, eaſy and familiar with his friends, a great pattern of

of learning, as may be collected from his aſſiſting Ariſtotle with a purſe of money to the completion of his natural hiſtory. He was brave often to raſhneſs; he often lamented that his father conquered every thing, and left him nothing to do; and exclaimed, in all the pride of regal dignity, Give me kings for competitors, and I will enter the liſts at Olympia. All his family and infant children were put to death by Caſſander. The firſt deliberation that was made after his deceaſe, among his generals, was to appoint his brother Aridæus ſucceſſor, until Roxane, who was then pregnant by him, brought into the world a legitimate heir. Perdiccas wiſhed to be ſupreme regent, as Aridæus wanted capacity; and, more ſtrongly to eſtabliſh himſelf, he married Cleopatra, Alexander's ſiſter, and made alliance with Eumenes. As he endeavoured to deprive Ptolemy of Egypt, he was defeated in a battle by Seleucus and Antigonus, on the banks of the river Nile, and aſſaſſinated by his own cavalry. Perdiccas was the firſt of Alexander's generals who took up arms againſt his fellow ſoldiers, and he was the firſt who fell a ſacrifice to his raſhneſs and cruelty. To defend himſelf againſt him, Ptolemy made a treaty of alliance with ſome generals, among whom was Antipater, who had ſtrengthened himſelf by giving his daughter Phila, an ambitious and aſpiring woman, in marriage to Craterus, another of the generals of Alexander. After many diſſenſions and bloody wars among themſelves, the generals of Alexander laid the foundations of ſeveral great empires in the three quarters of the globe. Ptolemy ſeized Egypt, where he firmly eſtabliſhed himſelf, and where his ſucceſſors were called Ptolemies, in honor of the founder of their empire, which ſubſiſted till the time of Auguſtus. Seleucus and his poſterity reigned in Babylon and Syria. Antigonus at firſt eſtabliſhed himſelf in Aſia Minor, and Antipater in Macedonia. The deſcendants of Antipater were conquered by the ſucceſſors of Antigonus, who reigned in Macedonia till it was reduced by the Romans in the time of king Perſeus. Lyſimachus made himſelf maſter of Thrace; and Leonatus, who had taken poſſeſſion of Phrygia, meditated for a while to drive Antipater from Macedonia. Eumenes eſtabliſhed himſelf in Cappadocia, but was ſoon overpowered by the combinations of his rival Antigonus, and ſtarved to death. During his life-time, Eumenes appeared ſo formidable to the ſucceſſors of Alexander, that none of them dared to aſſume the title of king. *Curt. C. 332, which became the capital of Egypt, on the weſtern ſide of the Delta. The commodities of India were brought there, and thence diſperſed to the different countries around the Mediterranean. Alexandria is famous, among other curioſities, for the large library which the pride or learning of the Ptolemies had collected there, at a vaſt expence, from all parts of the earth. This valuable repoſitory was burnt by the orders of the caliph Omar, in the 7th century; and it is ſaid, that during 6 months, the numerous volumes ſupplied fuel for the 4000 baths, which contributed to the health and convenience of the populous capital of Egypt. Alexandria has likewiſe been diſtinguiſhed for its ſchool, not only of theology and philoſophy, but of phyſic, where once to have ſtudied, was a ſufficient recommendation to diſtant countries. The modern town of Scanderoon has been erected upon the ruins of Alexandria, and, as if it were an inſult to its former greatneſs, it ſcarce contains 6000 inhabitants. Curt. 4, c. 8.—Strab. 17.—Plin. 5, c. 10——Another in Albania, at the foot of mount Caucaſus.——Another in Arachoſia, in India.——The capital of Aria, between Hecatompylon and Bactra.——Another of Carmania.——Another in Cilicia, on the confines of Syria.——Another, the capital of Margiana.——Another of Troas, &c. Curt. 7.—Plin. 6, c. 16, 23, 25.

ALPĒNUS, the capital of Locris, at the north of Thermopylæ. Herodot. 7, c. 176, &c.

ALPES, high mountains that ſeparate Italy from Spain, Gaul, Rhætia, and Germany. They are covered with perpetual ſnows, and diſtinguiſhed by different names according to their ſituation. A traveller is generally five days in reaching the top in ſome parts. They were ſuppoſed for a long time to be impaſſable. Hannibal marched his army over them, and made his way through rocks, by ſoftening and breaking them with vinegar. They were inhabited by fierce uncivilized nations, who were unſubdued till the age of Auguſtus, who to eternize the victory he had obtained over them, erected a pillar in their territory. Strab. 4 & 5.—Liv. 21, c. 35.—Juv. 10, v. 151.—Horat. 2, Sat. 5, v. 41.—Lucan. 1, v. 183.—Tacit. Hiſt. 3, c. 53.

ALPHEIA, a ſirname of Diana in Elis. It was given her when the river Alpheus endeavoured to raviſh her without ſucceſs.—— A ſirname of the nymph Arethuſa, becauſe loved by the Alpheus. Ovid Met. 5, v. 487.

ALPHENOR, one of Niobe's ſons. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 6.

ALPHĒNUS. Vid. Alfenus.

ALPHESIBŒA, daughter of the river Phlegeus, married Alcmæon, ſon of Amphiaraus, who had fled to her father's court after the murder of his mother. [Vid. Alcmæon.] She received as a bridal preſent, the famous necklace which Polynices had given to Eriphyle, to induce her to betray her huſband Amphiaraus. Alcmæon, being perſecuted by the manes of his mother, left his wife by order of the oracle, and retired near the Achelous, whoſe daughter Callirhoe he married. Callirhoe had two ſons by him, and begged of him, as a preſent, the necklace which was then in the hands of Alphesibœa. He endeavoured to obtain it, and was killed by Temenus and Axion, Alphesibœa's brothers, who thus revenged their ſiſter, who had been ſo innocently abandoned. Hygin. fab. 244.—Propert. 1, el. 15 v. 15.—Pauſ. 8, c. 24.

ALPHESIBŒUS, a ſhepherd, often mentioned in Virgil's eclogues.

ALPHEUS, a famous river of Peloponneſus, which riſes in Arcadia, and after paſſing through Elis and Achaia, falls into the ſea. The god of this river fell in love with the nymph Arethuſa, and purſued her till ſhe was changed into a fountain by Diana. The fountain Arethuſa is in Ortygia, a ſmall iſland near Syracuſe; and the ancients affirm, that the river Alpheus paſſes under the ſea from Peloponneſus, and, without mingling itſelf with the ſalt waters, riſes again in Ortygia, and joins the ſtream of Arethuſa. If any thing is thrown into the Alpheus in Elis, according to their traditions, it will re-appear, after ſome time, ſwimming in the waters of Arethuſa near Sicily. Hercules made uſe of the Alpheus to clean the ſtables of Augias. Strab. 6.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 694.—Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 10 —Lucan. 3, v. 176.—Stat. Theb. 1 & 4.—Mela 2, c. 7.—Pauſ. 5, c. 7. l. 6, c. 21.—Marcellin. 25.—Plin. 2, c. 103.

ALPHIUS, or ALFEUS, a celebrated uſurer, ridiculed in Horat. Epod. 2.

ALPHIUS AVITUS, a writer in the age of Severus, who gave an account of illuſtrious men, and an hiſtory of the Carthaginian war.

ALPINUS, belonging to the Alps. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 442.

ALPĪNUS (CORNELIUS), a contemptible poet, whom Horace ridicules for the awkward manner in which he introduces the death of Memnon in a tragedy, and the pitiful ſtyle with which he deſcribes the Rhine, in an epic poem he had attempted on the wars in Germany. Horat. 1. Sat. 10, v. 3.—— Julius, one of the chiefs of the Helvetii. Tacit. Hiſt. 1, c. 68.

ALPIS, a ſmall river falling into the Danube.

ALSIUM, a town on the Tiber. Sil. 8.

ALTHÆA,

ALTHÆA, daughter of Theſtius and Eurythemis, married Œneus, king of Calydon, by whom he had many children, among whom was Meleager. When Althæa brought forth Meleager, the Parcæ placed a log of wood in the fire, and ſaid, that as long as it was preſerved, ſo long would the life of the child juſt born, be prolonged. The mother ſaved the wood from the flames, and kept it very carefully; but when Meleager killed his two uncles, Althæa's brothers, Althæa, to revenge their death, threw the log into the fire, and as ſoon as it was burnt, Meleager expired. She was afterwards ſo ſorry for the death which ſhe had cauſed, that ſhe killed herſelf, unable to ſurvive her ſon. Vid. Meleager.—Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 4.—Homer. Il. 9.—Pauſ. 8, c. 45, l. 10, c. 31.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.

ALTHÆMĔNES, a ſon of Creteus king of Crete. Hearing that either he or his brothers were to be their father's murderer, he fled to Rhodes, where he made a ſettlement to avoid becoming a parricide. After the death of all his other ſons, Creteus went after his ſon Althæmenes; when he landed in Rhodes, the inhabitants attacked him, ſuppoſing him to be an enemy, and he was killed by the hand of his own ſon. When Althæmenes knew that he had killed his father, he entreated the gods to remove him, and the earth immediately opened, and ſwallowed him up. Apollod. 3, c. 2.

ALTĪNUM, a flouriſhing city near Aquileia. Plin. 3, c. 18.

ALYXOTHOË, daughter of Dymus, was mother of Æſacus by Priam. Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 11.

AMADŎCUS, a king of Thrace, defeated by his antagoniſt Seuthes. Ariſtot. 5.—Polit. 10.

AMAGE, a queen of Sarmatia, remarkable for her juſtice and fortitude. Polyæn. 8, c. 56.

AMALTHÆA, daughter of Meliſſus king of Crete, fed Jupiter with goat's milk. Hence ſome authors have called her a goat, and have maintained that Jupiter, to reward her kindneſſes, placed her in heaven as a conſtellation, and gave one of her horns to the nymphs who had taken care of his infant years. This horn was called the horn of plenty, and had the power to give the nymphs whatever they deſired. Diod. 3, 4, & 5.—Ovid. Faſt. 5, v. 113.—Strab. 10.—Hygin. fab. 139.—Pauſ. 7, c. 26 ——A Sibyl of Cumæ, called alſo Hierophile and Demophile. She is ſuppoſed to be the ſame who brought nine books of prophecies to Tarquin king of Rome, &c. Varro.—Tibull. 2, el. 5, v. 67. [Vid. Sibyllæ.]

AMALTHĔUM, a public place which Atticus had opened in his country-houſe, and provided with every thing which could furniſh entertainment and convey inſtruction. Cic. ad Attic. 1, ep. 13.

AMĂNA or AMĂNUS, a mountain of Cilicia. Lucan. 3, v. 244.

CN. SAL. AMANDUS, a rebel general under Diocleſian, who aſſumed imperial honors, and was at laſt conquered by Diocleſian's colleague.

AMARYNTHUS, a village of Eubœa, whence Diana is called Amaryſia, and her feſtivals in that town Amarynthia.—Eubœa is ſometimes called Amarynthus. Pauſ. 1, c. 31.

Amas, a mountain of Laconia. Paus. 3.

Amasia, a city of Pontus, where Mithridates the great, and Strabo the geographer, were born. Strab. 12.

Amăsēnus, a ſmall river of Latium falling into the Tyrrhene ſea. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 685.

Amăsis, a man who, from a common ſoldier, became king of Egypt. He made war againſt Arabia, and died before the invaſion of his country by Cambyſes king of Perſia. He made a law, that every one of his ſubjects ſhould yearly give an account to the public magiſtrates, of the manner in which he ſupported himſelf. He refuſed to continue in alliance with Polycrates the tyrant of Samos, on account of his uncommon proſperity. When Cambyſes came into Egypt, he ordered the body of Amaſis to be dug up, and to be inſulted and burnt; an action which was very inimical to the religious notions of the Egyptians. Herodot. 1, 2, 3.——A man who led the Perſians againſt the inhabitants of Barce. Herodot. 4, c. 201, &c.

Amastris, the wife of Dionyſius the tyrant of Sicily. She was ſiſter to Darius, whom Alexander conquered. Strab.——Alſo, the wife of Xerxes, king of Perſia. [Vid. Ameſtris.]——A city of Paphlagonia, on the Euxine ſea. Catull.

Amastrus, one of the auxiliaries of Perſes, againſt Æetes king of Colchis. He was killed by Argus, ſon of Phryxus. Flacc. 6, v. 544.——A friend of Æneas, killed by Camilla in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 673.

Amăta, the wife of king Latinus. She had betrothed her daughter Lavinia to Turnus, before the arrival of Æneas in Italy. She zealouſly favored the intereſt of Turnus; and when her daughter was given in marriage to Æneas, ſhe hung herſelf, to avoid the ſight of her ſon-in-law. Virg. Æn. 7, &c.

Amăthus, (gen. untis) a city on the ſouthern ſide of the iſland of Cyprus, particularly dedicated to Venus. The iſland is ſometimes called Amathuſia. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 51. Ptol. 5, c. 14.

Amaxampēus, a fountain of Scythia, whoſe waters imbitter the ſtream of the river Hyparis. Herodot. 4, c. 52.

Amaxia or Amaxīta, an ancient town of Troas.——A place of Cilicia abounding with wood fit for building ſhips. Plin. 5, c. 9.—Strab. 14.

Amazēnes or Mazēnes, a prince of the iſland Oaractas, who ſailed for ſome time with the Macedonians and Nearchus in Alexander's expedition into the eaſt. Arrian. in Indic.

Amazŏnes or Amazŏnĭdes, a nation of famous women who lived near the river Thermodon in Cappadocia. All their life was employed in wars and manly exerciſes. They never had any commerce with the other ſex; but, only for the ſake of propagation, they viſited the inhabitants of the neighbouring country for a few days, and the male children which they brought forth were given to the fathers. According to Juſtin, they were ſtrangled as ſoon as born, and Diodorus ſays that they maimed them and diſtorted their limbs. The females were carefully educated as their mothers, in the labours of the field; their right breaſt was burnt off, that they might hurl a javelin with more force, and make a better uſe of the bow; from that circumſtance, therefore, their name is derived (α non, μαζα mamma). They founded an extenſive empire in Aſia Minor, along the ſhores of the Euxine, and near the Thermodon. They were defeated in a battle near the Thermodon, by the Greeks; and ſome of them migrated beyond the Tanais, and extended their country as far as the Caſpian ſea. Themyſcyra was the moſt capital of their towns. Smyrna, Magneſia, Thyatira, and Epheſus, according to ſome authors, were built by them. Diodorus l. 3, mentions a nation of Amazons in Africa, more ancient than thoſe of Aſia. Some authors, among whom is Strabo, deny the exiſtence of the Amazons, but Juſtin and Diodorus particularly ſupport it; and the latter ſays, that Penthesilea, one of their queens, came to the Trojan war on the ſide of Priam, and that ſhe was killed by Achilles, and from that time the glory and character of the Amazons gradually decayed, and was totally forgotten. The Amazons of Africa flouriſhed long before the Trojan war, and many of their actions have been attributed to thoſe of Aſia. It is ſaid, that after they had almoſt ſubdued all Aſia, they invaded Attica, and were conquered by Theſeus. Their moſt famous actions were their expedition againſt Priam, and afterwards the aſſiſtance they gave him during the Trojan war; and their invaſion of Attica, to puniſh Theſeus, who had carried away Antiope, one of their queens. They were alſo conquered by Bellerophon and Hercules. Among their queens, Hyppolite, Antiope, Lampeto, Marpeſia, &c. are famous. Curtius ſays, that Thaleſtris, one of their queens, came to Alexander whilſt he was purſuing his conqueſts in Aſia, for the ſake of raiſing children from a man of ſuch military reputation; and that after ſhe had remained 13 days with him, ſhe retired in her country. The Amazons were ſuch expert archers, that, to denote the goodneſs of a bow or quiver, it was requiſite to call it Amazonian. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 311.—Jornand. de Reb. Get. c. 7.—Philoſtr. Icon. 2, c. 5.—Juſtin. 2, c. 4.—Curt. 6, c. 5.—Plin. 6, c. 7, l. 14, c. 8, l. 36, c. 5.—Herodot. 4, c. 110.—

AMBARRI, a people of Gallia Celtica; they were related to the Ædui. Cæſ. bell. G. 1, c. 11.

AMBĔNUS, a mountain of European Sarmatia. Flacc. 6, v. 85.

AMBARVĀLIA, a joyful proceſſion round the ploughed fields, in honor of Ceres the goddeſs of corn. There were two feſtivals of that name celebrated by the Romans, one about the month of April, the other in July. They went three times round their fields crowned with oak leaves, ſinging hymns to Ceres, and entreating her to preſerve their corn. The word is derived ab ambiendis arvis, going round the fields. A ſow, a ſheep, and a bull, called ambarvaliæ hoſtiæ, were afterwards immolated, and the ſacrifice has ſometimes been called ſuovetaurilia, from ſus, ovis, and taurus. Cato de R. R. c. 141.

AMBIALĪTES, a people of Gallia Celtica. Cæſ. bell. G. 3, c. 9.

AMBIĀNUM, a town of Belgium. Its inhabitants conſpired againſt J. Cæſar. Cæſ. 2, bell. G. c. 4.

AMBIATĪNUM, a village of Germany, where the emperor Caligula was born. Sueton. in Cal. 8.

AMBIGĀTUS, a king of the Celtæ, in the time of Tarquinius Priſcus. Seeing the great population of his country, he ſent his two nephews, Sigoveſus and Belloveſus, with two colonies, in queſt of new ſettlements; the former towards the Hercynian woods, and the other towards Italy. Liv. 5, c. 34, &c.

AMBIŌRIX, a king of the Eburones in Gaul. He was a great enemy to Rome, and was killed in a battle with J. Cæſar, in which 60,000 of his countrymen were ſlain. Cæſ. bell. G. 5, c. 11, 26. l. 6, c. 30.

AMBLADA, a town of Piſidia. Strab.

AMBRACIA, a city of Epirus, near the Acheron, the reſidence of king Pyrrhus. Auguſtus, after the battle of Actium, called it Nicopolis. Mela. 2, c. 3.—Plin. 4, c. 1.—Polyb. 4, c. 63.—Strab. 10.

AMBRACIUS SINUS, a bay of the Ionian ſea, near Ambracia, about 300 ſtadia deep, narrow at the entrance, but within near 100 ſtadia in breadth. It is now called the gulph of Larta. Polyb. 4, c. 63.—Mela. 2, c. 3. —Flor. 4, c. 11.

AMBRŌSIA, feſtivals obſerved in honor of Bacchus, in ſome cities in Greece. They were the ſame as the Brumalia of the Romans. ——One of the daughters of Atlas, changed into a conſtellation after death.——The food of the gods was called ambroſia, and their drink nectar. The word ſignifies immortal. It had the power of giving immortality to all thoſe who eat it. It was ſweeter than honey, and of a moſt odoriferous ſmell. Berenice, the wife of Ptolemy Soter, was ſaved from death by eating ambroſia given her by Venus. Titonus was made immortal by Aurora, by eating ambroſia; and in like manner Tantalus and Pelops, who, on account of their impiety, had been driven from heaven, and compelled to die upon earth. It had the power of healing wounds. Apollo, in Homer's Iliad, ſaves Sarpedon's body from putrefaction by rubbing it with ambroſia; and Venus heals the wounds of her ſon, in Virgil's Æneid, with it. The gods uſed generally to perfume their hair with ambroſia, as Juno when ſhe adorned herſelf to captivate Jupiter, and Venus when ſhe appeared to Æneas. Homer. Il. 1, 14, 16 & 24.—Lucian de dea Syria.—Catull. ep. 100.—Theocrit. Id. 15.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 407, l. 12, v. 419.—Ovid. Met. 2.—Pindar. 1, Olymp.

AMBROSIUS, biſhop of Milan, obliged the emperor Theodoſius to make penance for the murder of the people of Theſſalonica, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his writings, eſpecially againſt the Arians. His 3 books de officiis are ſtill extant. His ſtyle is not inelegant, but his diction is ſententious; his opinions eccentric, though his ſubject is diverſified by copiouſneſs of thought. He died A. D. 397. The beſt edition of his works is that of the Benedicts, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1686.

AMBRŸON, a man who wrote the life of Theocritus of Chios. Diog.

AMILCAR, a Carthaginian general of great eloquence and cunning. He was surnamed Rhodanus. When the Athenians were afraid of Alexander, Amilcar went to his camp, gained his confidence, and secretly transmitted an account of all his schemes to Athens. Trogus. 21, c. 6.——A Carthaginian, whom the Syracusans called to their assistance against the tyrant Agathocles, who besieged their city. Amilcar soon after favored the interest of Agathocles, for which he was accused at Carthage. He died in Syracuse, B. C. 309. Diod. 20.—Justin 22, c. 2 & 3.——A Carthaginian, surnamed Barcas, father to the celebrated Annibal. He was general in Sicily during the first Punic war; and after a peace had been made with the Romans, he quelled a rebellion of slaves, who had besieged Carthage, and taken many towns of Africa, and rendered themselves so formidable to the Carthaginians that they begged and obtained assistance from Rome. After this, he passed into Spain with his son Annibal, who was but nine years of age, and laid the foundation of the town of Barcelona. He was killed in a battle against the Vettones B. C. 237. He had formed the plan of an invasion of Italy, by crossing the Alps, which his son afterwards carried into execution. His great enmity to the Romans was the cause of the second Punic war. He used to say of his three sons, that he kept three lions to devour the Roman power. C. Nep. in Vit.—Liv. 21, c. 1.—Polyb. 2.—Plut. in Annib.——A Carthaginian general, who assisted the Insubres against Rome, and was taken by Cn. Cornelius. Liv. 32, c. 30. l. 33, c. 8.——A son of Hanno, defeated in Sicily by Gelon, the same day that Xerxes was defeated at Salamis by Themistocles. AMMĀLO, a festival in honor of Jupiter in Greece.

AMMIĀNUS. Vid. Marcellinus.

AMMON & HAMMON, a name of Jupiter, worshipped in Libya. He appeared under the form of a ram to Bacchus, who, with his army, suffered the greatest extremities for want of water, in the deserts of Africa, and shewed him a fountain. Upon this, Bacchus erected a temple to his father, under the name of Jupiter Ammon, i. e. sandy, with the horns of a ram. The ram, according to some, was made a constellation. The temple of Jupiter Ammon was in the deserts of Libya, nine days journey from Alexandria. It had a famous oracle, which, according to ancient tradition, was established about 18 centuries before the time of Augustus, by two doves who flew away from Thebais in Egypt, and came one to Dodona, and the other to Libya, where the people were soon informed of their divine mission. The oracle of Hammon was consulted by Hercules, Perseus, and others; but when it pronounced Alexander to be the son of Jupiter, such flattery destroyed its long established reputation, and in the age of Plutarch it was scarce known. The situation of the temple was pleasant; and according to Ovid. Met. 15, v. 310.—Lucret. 6, v. 847.—Herodot. in Melpom.—Curt. 4, c. 7. there was near it a fountain whose waters were cold at noon and midnight, and warm in the morning and evening. There were above 100 priests in the temple, but only the elders delivered oracles. There was also an oracle of Jupiter Jupiter Ammon in Æthiopia. Plin. 6, c. 29.—Strab. 1, 11 & 17.—Plut. cur orac. edi nefierant, & in Iſid.—Curt. 6, c. 10. l. 10, c. 5.—Herodot. 1, c. 6. l. 2, c. 32 & 55. l. 4. c. 44.—Pauſ. 3 c. 18. l. 4. c. 23 —Hygin. fab. 133. Poet. aſtr. 2, c. 20 —Juſtin. 1, c. 9 l. 11, c. 11.——A king of Libya, father to Bacchus. AMPHIĀNAX, a king of Lycia in the time of Acriſius & Prœtus. Apollod. 2, c. 2.

AMPHIARĀUS, ſon of Oicleus, or according to others, of Apollo, by Hypermneſtra, was at the chace of the Calydonian boar, and accompanied the Argonauts in their expedition. He was famous for his knowledge of futurity. He married Eriphyle, the ſiſter of Adraſtus king of Argos, by whom he had two ſons, Alcmæon & Amphilochus. When Adraſtus, at the requeſt of Polynices, declared war againſt Thebes, Amphiaraus ſecreted himſelf, not to accompany his brother-in-law in an expedition in which he knew he was to periſh. But Eriphyle, who knew where he had concealed himſelf, was prevailed upon to betray him by Polynices, who gave her, as a reward for her perfidy, a famous golden necklace ſet with diamonds. Amphiaraus being thus diſcovered, went to the war, but previouſly charged his ſon Alcmæon to put to death his mother Eriphyle, as ſoon as he was informed that he was killed. The Theban war was fatal to the Argives, and Amphiaraus was ſwallowed up in his chariot by the earth as he attempted to retire from the battle. The news of his death was brought to Alcmæon, who immediately executed his father's command, and murdered Eriphyle. Amphiaraus received divine honors after death, and had a celebrated temple and oracle at Oropios in Attica. His ſtatue was made of white marble, and near his temple was a fountain, whoſe waters were ever held ſacred. They only who had conſulted his oracle, or had been delivered from a diſeaſe, were permitted to bathe in it, after which they threw pieces of gold and ſilver into the ſtream. Thoſe who conſulted the oracle of Amphiaraus, firſt purified themſelves, and abſtained from food for 24 hours, and three days from wine, after which they ſacrificed a ram to the prophet, and ſpread the ſkin upon the ground, upon which they ſlept in expectation of receiving in a dream the anſwer of the oracle. Plutarch de orac. defect. mentions, that the oracle of Amphiaraus was once conſulted in the time of Xerxes, by one of the ſervants of Mardonius, for his maſter, who was then with an army in Greece; and that the ſervant, when aſleep, ſaw in a dream the prieſt of the temple, who upbraided him, and drove him away, and even threw ſtones at his head when he refuſed to comply. This oracle was verified in the death of Mardonius, who was actually killed by the blow of a ſtone he received on the head. Cic. de Div. 1, c. 40 —Philoſtr. in vit. Apollon. 2, c. 11.—*Homer. AMPHICTYON, ſon of Deucalion & Pyrrha, reigned at Athens after Cranaus, and firſt attempted to give the interpretation of dreams, and to draw omens. Some ſay that the deluge happened in his age. Juſtin. 2, c. 6.——

The

The ſon of Helenus, who firſt eſtabliſhed the celebrated council of the Amphictyons, compoſed of the wiſeſt and moſt virtuous men of ſome cities of Greece. This auguſt aſſembly conſiſted of 12 perſons, originally ſent by the following ſtates; the Ionians, Dorians, Perrhæbians, Bœotians, Magneſians, Phthians, and Æninians. Other cities in proceſs of time ſent alſo ſome of their citizens to the council of the Amphictyons, and in the age of Antoninus Pius, they were encreaſed to the number of 30. They generally met twice every year at Delphi, and ſometimes ſat at Thermopylæ. They took into conſideration all matters of difference which might exiſt between the different ſtates of Greece. When the Phocians plundered the temple of Delphi, the Amphictyons declared war againſt them, and this war was ſupported by all the ſtates of Greece, and laſted 10 years. The Phocians, with their allies, the Lacedæmonians, were deprived of the privilege of ſitting in the council of the Amphictyons, and the Macedonians were admitted in their place, for their ſervices in ſupport of the war. About 60 years after, when Brennus, with the Gauls, invaded Greece, the Phocians behaved with ſuch courage, that they were reinſtated in all their former privileges. Before they proceeded to buſineſs, the Amphictyons ſacrificed an ox to the god of Delphi, and cut his fleſh into ſmall pieces, intimating that union and unanimity prevailed in the ſeveral cities which they repreſented. Their deciſions were held ſacred and inviolable, and even arms were taken up to inforce them. Pauſ. in Phocic. & Achaic.—Strab. 8.—Suidas.—Heſych.

AMPHĪON, was ſon of Jupiter, by Antiope daughter of Nycteus, who had married Lycus, and had been repudiated by him when he married Dirce. Amphion was born at the ſame birth as Zethus, on mount Cytheron, where Antiope had fled to avoid the reſentment of Dirce; and the two children were expoſed in the woods, but preſerved by a ſhepherd. [Vid Antiope.] When Amphion grew up, he cultivated poetry, and made ſuch an uncommon progreſs in muſic, that he is ſaid to have been the inventor of it, and to have built the walls of Thebes at the ſound of his lyre. Mercury taught him muſic, and gave him the lyre. He was the firſt who raiſed an altar to this god. Zethus and Amphion united to avenge the wrongs which their mother had ſuffered from the cruelties of Dirce. They beſieged and took Thebes, put Lycus to death, and tied his wife to the tail of a wild bull, who dragged her through precipices till ſhe expired. The fable of Amphion's moving ſtones and raiſing the walls of Thebes at the ſound of his lyre, has been explained by ſuppoſing that he perſuaded by his eloquence, a wild and uncivilized people to unite together and build a town to protect themſelves againſt the attacks of their enemies. Homer. Theb. 1, v. 10.——A ſon of Jaſus king of Orchomenos, by Perſephone daughter of Mius. He married Niobe, daughter of Tantalus, by whom he had many children, among whom was Chloris the wife of Neleus. He has been confounded by mythologiſts with the ſon of Antiope, though Homer, in his Odyſſey, ſpeaks of them both, and diſtinguiſhes them beyond contradiction. The number of Amphion's children, according to Homer, was 12, ſix of each ſex; according to Ælian, 20; and according to Ovid 14, ſeven males and ſeven females. When Niobe boaſted herſelf greater, and more deſerving erving of immortality than Latona, all her children, except Chloris, were deſtroyed by the arrows of Apollo and Diana; Niobe herſelf was changed into a ſtone, and Amphion killed himſelf in a fit of deſpair. *Homer. AMPHITRYON, a Theban prince, ſon of Alcæus and Hypponome. His ſiſter Anaxo had married Electryon king of Mycenæ, whoſe ſons were killed in a battle by the Teleboans. Electryon promiſed his crown, and daughter Alcmena, to him who could revenge the death of his ſons upon the Teleboans; and Amphitryon offered himſelf, and was received, on condition that he ſhould not approach Alcmena before he had obtained a victory. Jupiter, who was captivated with the charms of Alcmena, borrowed the features of Amphitryon, when he was gone to the war, and introduced himſelf to Electryon's daughter, as her huſband returned victorious. Alcmena became pregnant of Hercules by Jupiter, and of Iphiclus by Amphitryon, after his return [Vid. Alcmena.] When Amphitryon returned from the war, he brought back to Electryon, the herds which the Teleboans had taken from him. One of the cows having ſtrayed from the reſt, Amphitryon, to bring them together, threw a ſtick, which ſtruck the horns of the cow, and rebounded with ſuch violence upon Electryon that he died on the ſpot. After this accidental murder, Sthenelus, Electryon's brother, ſeized the kingdom of Mycenæ, and obliged Amphitryon to leave Argolis, and retire to Thebes with Alcmena. Creon, king of Thebes, purified him of the murder. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 213.—Propert. 4, el. 10, v. 1.—Heſiod. in Scut. Hercul.—Hygin. fab. 29.—Paſ. 8, c. 14.

Amŭlius, king of Alba, was ſon of Proca, and youngeſt brother to Numitor. The crown belonged to Numitor by right of birth; but Amulius diſpoſſeſſed him of it, and even put to death his ſon Lauſus, and conſecrated his daughter Rhea Sylvia to the ſervice of Veſta, to prevent her ever becoming a mother. Yet, in ſpite of all theſe precautions, Rhea became pregnant by the god Mars, and brought forth twins, Romulus and Remus. Amulius, who was informed of this, ordered the mother to be buried alive for violating the laws of Veſta, which enjoined perpetual chaſtity, and the two children to be thrown into the river. They were providentially ſaved by ſome ſhepherds, or, as others ſay, by a ſhe-wolf; and when they had attained the years of manhood, they put to death the uſurper, Amulius, and reſtored the crown to their grandfather. *Ovid. Amўclæ, a town of Italy between Cajeta and Tarracina, built by the companions of Caſtor and Pollux. The inhabitants were ſtrict followers of the precepts of Pythagoras, and therefore abſtained from fleſh. They were killed by ſerpents, which they thought impious to deſtroy, though in their own defence. Plin. 8, c. 29. Once a report prevailed in Amyclæ, that the enemies were coming to ſtorm it; upon which the inhabitants made a law, that forbade ſuch a report to be credited, and when the enemy really arrived, no one mentioned it, or took up arms in his own defence, and the town was eaſily taken. From this circumſtance the epithet of tacitæ has been given to Amyclæ. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 564—Sil. 8, v. 529.——A city of Peloponneſus, built by Amyclas. Caſtor and Pollux were born there. The country was famous for dogs. Apollo, called Amyclæus, had a rich and magnificent temple at Amyclæ, ſurrounded with delightful groves. Pauſ. 3, c. 18.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 223.—Sil. 8, *Virg. Amўdon, a city of Macedonia, which ſent auxiliaries to Priam during the Trojan war. Homer Il. 2.

Amўmŏne, daughter of Danaus and Europa, married Enceladus, ſon of Ægyptus, whom whom she murdered the first night of her nuptials. She wounded a satyr with an arrow which she had aimed at a stag. The satyr pursued her, and even offered her violence, but Neptune delivered her. It was said, that she was the only one of her 50 sisters who was not condemned to fill a leaky tub with water in hell, because she had been continually employed, by order of her father, in supplying the city of Argos with water, in a great drought. Neptune saw her in this employment, and was enamoured of her. He carried her away, and, in the place where she stood, he raised a fountain, by striking a rock. The fountain has been called Amymone. She had Nauplius by Neptune. Apollod. 2.—Strab. 8.—Paus. 2. 37.—*Ovid. AMYNTAS 1st, was king of Macedonia after his father Alcetas. His son Alexander murdered the ambassadors of Megabyzus, for their wanton and insolent behaviour to the ladies of his father's court. Bubares, a Persian general, was sent with an army to revenge the death of the ambassadors; but instead of making war, he married the king's daughter, and defended his possessions. Justin. 7, c. 3. Herodot. 5, 7 & 8.——The second of that name was son of Menelaus, and king of Macedonia, after his murder of Pausanias. He was expelled by the Illyrians, and restored by the Thessalians and Spartans. He made war against the Illyrians and Olynthians, and lived to a great age. His wife, Eurydice, conspired against his life; but her snares were seasonably discovered by one of his daughters by a former wife. He had Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip, Alexander the Great's father, by his first wife; and by the other he had Archelaus, Aridæus, and Menelaus. He reigned 24 years; and soon after his death, his son Philip murdered all his brothers, and ascended the throne. Justin. 7, c. 4 & 9.—Diod. 14, &—C. Nep. & Plut. in Pelopid.—There is another king of Macedonia of the same name, but of his life few particulars are recorded in history.—A man who succeeded Dejotarius, in the kingdom of Gallogræcia. After his death it became a Roman province under Augustus. Strab. 12.——One of Alexander's officers.—Another officer who deserted to Darius, and was killed as he attempted to seize Egypt. Curt. 3, c. 9.——A son of Antiochus, who withdrew himself from Macedonia, because he hated Alexander.—An officer in Alexander's cavalry. He had two brothers called Simmias and Polemon. He was accused of conspiracy against the king, on account of his great intimacy with Philotas, and acquitted. Curt. 4, c. 13; l. 6, c. 9. & 8, c. 12.——A shepherd's name in Virgil's Eclog.—A Greek writer who composed several works quoted by Athenæus.

ANACES, a name given to Castor and Pollux. Their festivals were called Anaceia. Plut. in Thes.

ANACHARSIS, a Scythian philosopher, 592 B. C. who, on account of his wisdom, temperance, and extensive knowledge, has been called one of the seven wise men. He made use of a cart instead of a house. He used to compare laws to cobwebs, which can stop only small flies, and are unable to resist the superior force of large insects. When he returned to Scythia, from Athens, where he had spent some time in study, and in the friendship of Solon, he attempted to introduce there the laws of the Athenians, which so irritated his brother, who was then on the throne, that he killed him with an arrow. Anacharsis has rendered himself famous among the ancients by his writings, and his poems on war, the laws of Scythia, &c.—Later authors have attributed to him the invention of anchors, and the potter's wheel. Herodot. 4, c. 46, 47 & 48.—Plut. in Conviv. Cic. Tusc. 5, c. 32.

ANACIUM, a mountain with a temple sacred to the Anaces in Peloponnesus. Polyæn. 3, c. 21.

ANACREON, a famous lyric poet of Teos, in Ionia, highly favoured by Polycrates and Hipparchus son of Philostratus. He was of a lascivious and intemperate disposition, much given to drinking, and deeply enamoured of a youth called Bathyllus. His odes are still extant, and the uncommon sweetness and elegance of his poetry have been the admiration of every age and country. He lived to his 85th year, and after much pleasure and debauchery, choaked himself with a grape stone, and expired. Plato says, that he was descended of an illustrious family, and that Codrus, the last king of Athens, was one of his progenitors. His statue was placed in the citadel of Athens, representing him as an old drunken man, singing, with every mark of dissipation and intemperance. Anacreon flourished 532 B. C. All that he wrote is not extant; his odes were first published by H. Stephens, with an elegant translation. The best editions of Anacreon are, that of Maittaire, 4to. London 1725, of which only one hundred copies were printed, and the very correct one of Barnes, 12mo, Cantab. 1721. Paus. 1, c. 2. 25.—Strab. 14.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 4.—Cic. in Tusc. 4, c. 33.—Horat. epod. 14, v. 20.—Plin. 7, c. 7.—Herodot. 3. c. 121.

ANACTORIA & ANACTORIUM, a town of Epirus, in a peninsula towards the gulf of Ambracia. It was founded by a Corinthian colony, and was the cause of many quarrels between the Corcyreans and Corinthians.—Augustus carried the inhabitants to the city of Nicopolis, after the battle of Actium. Strab. 10.—Thucyd. 1, c 55.—Plin. 4, c. 1. 5, c. 29.——An ancient name of Miletus.

ANADYOMENE, a valuable painting of Venus rising from the sea, by Apelles. Augustus bought it, and placed it in the temple of J. Cæsar. The lower part of it was a little defaced, and there were found no painters in Rome able to repair it. Plin 35. c 10.

ANAGNIA, a city of the Hernici in Latium, where Antony struck a medal when he divorced Octavia and married Cleopatra. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 684.—Strab. 5.—Ital. 8, c. 392.

ANAITIS, a goddess of Armenia. The virgins who were consecrated to her service, esteemed themselves more dignified by public prostitution. The festivals of the deity are called Sacarum Festa; and when they are celebrated, both sexes assist at the ceremony, and inebriate themselves to such a degree, that the whole is concluded by a scene of the greatest lasciviousness and intemperance. They were first instituted by Cyrus, when he marched against the Sacæ, and covered tables with the most exquisite dainties, that he might detain the enemy by the novelty and sweetness of food to which they were unaccustomed, and thus easily destroy them. Strab. 11.——Diana is also worshipped under this name by the Lydians. Plin. 33, c. 4.

ANANIAS, an Iambic poet. Athen.

ANAPHE, an island that rose out of the Cretan sea, and received this name from the Argonauts, who, in the middle of a storm, suddenly saw the new moon. Apollo was worshipped there, and called Anaphæus. Apollonius.

ANAPHLYSTUS, an Athenian tribe called after an ancient hero of the same name, who was son of Troezen.——A small village near Athens.

ANAPUS, a river of Epirus. Thucyd. 3, c. 82.——Of Sicily. Id. 6, c. 96.

ANARTES, a people of lower Pannonia. Cæs. 6, bell. G. c. 25.

ANAS, a river of Spain. Strab. 3.

ANATOLE, one of the Horæ. Hygin. fab. 183——A mountain near the Ganges, where Apollo ravished a nymph called Anaxibia.

ANAUCHIDAS, a Samian wrestler. Paus. 5, c. 27.

ANAURUS, a river of Thessaly, near the foot of mount Pelion.

ANAX, a son of Cœlus and Terra, from whom Miletus has been called Anactoria. Paus. 1, c. 36. l. 7, c. 2.

ANAXAGORAS succeeded his father Megapenthes on the throne of Argos. He shared the sovereign power with Bias and Melampus, who had cured the women of Argos of madness. Paus. 2, c. 18.——A Clazomenian philosopher, son of Hegesibulus, disciple to Anaximenes, and preceptor to Socrates, and Euripides. He disregarded wealth and honors, to indulge his fondness for meditation and philosophy. He applied himself to astronomy, was acquainted with eclipses, and predicted that one day a stone would fall from the sun, which it is said really fell into the river Ægos. Anaxagoras travelled into Egypt for improvement, and used to say that he preferred a grain of wisdom to heaps of gold. Pericles was in the number of his pupils, and often consulted him in matters of state; and once dissuaded him from starving himself to death. The ideas of Anaxagoras, concerning the heavens, were wild and extravagant. He supposed that the sun was inflammable matter, about the bigness of Peloponnesus; and that the moon was inhabited. The heavens he believed to be of stone, and the earth of similar materials. He was accused of impiety, and condemned to die; but but he ridiculed the ſentence, and ſaid it had long been pronounced upon him by nature. Being aſked whether his body ſhould be carried into his own country, he anſwered no, as the road that led to the other ſide of the grave was as long from one place as the other. When the people of Lampſacus aſked him before his death, whether he wiſhed any thing to be done in commemoration of him, Yes, ſays he, let the boys be allowed to play on the anniverſary of my death. This was carefully obſerved, and that time dedicated to relaxation, was called Anaxagoreia. He died in his 72d year, 428 B. C. His writings were not much eſteemed by his pupil Socrates. Diog. in vita.—Plut. in Nicâ & Pericl.—Cic. Acad. Q. 4, c. 23. Tuſc. 1, c. 43. ——A ſtatuary of Ægina. Pauſ. 5, c. 23.——A grammarian, diſciple to Zenodotus. Diog.——An orator, diſciple to Socrates. Diog.——A ſon of Echeanax, who, with his brothers Codrus and Diodorus, deſtroyed Hegeſias, tyrant of Epheſus.

ANAXANDER, of the family of the Heraclidæ, was ſon of Eurycrates, and king of Sparta. The ſecond Meſſian war began in his reign, in which Ariſtomenes ſo egregiouſly ſignalized himſelf. Herodot. 7, c. 204.—Plut. in Apoph.—Pauſ. 3, c. 3. l. 4, c. 15 & 16 —— A general of Megalopolis, taken by the Thebans.

ANAXANDRĬDES, ſon of Leon, and father to Cleomenes 1ſt, and Leonidas, was king of Sparta. By the order of the Ephori, he divorced his wife, of whom he was extremely fond, on account of her barrenneſs; and he was the firſt Lacedæmonian who had two wives. Herodot. 1, 5 & 7.—Plut. in Apoph. 1.—Pauſ. 3, c. 3, &c.——A ſon of Theopompus. Herodot. 8, c. 131.——A comic poet of Rhodes in the age of Philip and Alexander. He was the firſt poet who introduced intrigues and rapes upon the ſtage. He was of ſuch a paſſionate diſpoſition that he tore to pieces all his compoſitions which met with no ſucceſs. He compoſed about a hundred plays, of which ten obtained the prize. Some fragments of his poetry remain in Athæneus. He was ſtarved to death by order of the Athenians, for ſatyrizing their government. Ariſt. 3, Rett.

ANAXARCHUS, a philoſopher of Abdera, one of the followers of Democritus, and the friend of Alexander. When their monarch had been wounded in a battle, the philoſopher pointed to the place, adding, that is human blood and not the blood of a god. The freedom of Anaxarchus offended Nicocreon at Alexander's table, and the tyrant, in revenge, ſeized the philoſopher, and pounded him in a ſtone mortar with iron hammers. He bore this with much reſignation, and exclaimed, "Pound the body of Anaxarchus, for thou doſt not pound his ſoul." Upon this, Nicocreon threatened to cut his tongue, and Anaxarchus cut it off with his teeth, and ſpit it out into the tyrant's face. Ovid. in Ib. v. 571.—Plut. in Symp. 7.—Diog. in Vit.—Cic. in Tuſc. 2, c. 22.——A Theban general. Thucyd. 8, c. 100.

ANAXARĒTE, a girl of Salamis, who ſo arrogantly deſpiſed the addreſſes of Iphis, a youth of ignoble birth, that the lover hung himſelf at her door. She ſaw this ſad ſpectacle without emotion or pity, and was changed into a ſtone. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 748.

ANAXĒNOR, a muſician, whom M. Antony greatly honored, and preſented with the tribute of four cities. Strab. 14.

ANAXIAS, a Theban general. Pauſ. 3, c. 22.

ANAXIBIA, a ſiſter of Agamemnon. Pauſ. 2, c. 29.—A daughter of Bias, brother to the phyſician Melampus. She married Pelias, king of Iolchos, by whom ſhe had Acaſtus, and four daughters, Piſidice, Pelopea, Hippothoe, and Alceſte. Apollod. 1. c. 9. She is called daughter of Dymas, by Hygin. fab. 14.

ANAXICRĂTES, an Athenian archon. Pauſ. 10, c. 23.

ANAXIDĀMUS, ſucceeded his father Zeuxidamus on the throne of Sparta. Pauſ. 3, c. 7. l. 4, c. 15.

ANAXILAS & ANAXILĀUS, a Meſſenian, tyrant of Rhegium. He took Zancle, and was ſo mild and popular during his reign, that when he died, 476 B. C. he left his infant ſons to the care of one of his ſervants, and the citizens choſe rather to obey a ſlave than revolt from their benevolent ſovereign's children. Juſtin. 3, c. 2.—Pauſ. 4, c. 23. l. 5, c. 26.—Thucyd. 6, c. 5.—Herodot. 6, c. 23. l. 7, c. 167.——A magician of Lariſſa, baniſhed from Italy by Auguſtus.——A Pythagorean philoſopher. ——A phyſician.——An hiſtorian, who began his hiſtory with bitter invectives againſt former writers. Dionyſ. Hal.——A Lacedæmonian. Plut. in Alcib.——A comic writer, about the 100 olympiad.

ANAXILĪDES, wrote ſome treatiſes concerning philoſophers, and mentioned that Plato's mother became pregnant by a phantom of the god Apollo, from which circumſtance her ſon was called the prince of wiſdom. Diog. in Plat.

ANAXIMANDER, a Mileſian philoſopher, the companion and diſciple of Thales. He was the firſt who conſtructed ſpheres, aſſerted that the earth was of a cylindrical form, and taught that men were born of earth and water mixed together, and heated by the beams of the ſun, that the earth moved, and that the moon received light from the ſun. He made the firſt geographical maps and ſun-dials. He died in the 64th year of his age, B. C. 547. Cic. acad. Quæſt. 4, c. 37.—Diog. in vit.—Plin. 2, c. 79. He had a ſon who bore his name. Strab. 1.

ANAXIMĔNES, a philoſopher, ſon of Eraſiſtratus. He was the diſciple of Anaximander, and ſucceeded him in his ſchool. He ſaid that the air was the cauſe of every created being, and a ſelf-exiſtent divinity, and that the ſun, the moon, and the ſtars, had been made from the earth. He died 504 years B. C. Cic. acad. Quæſt. 4, c. 37, de Nat. D. 1, c. 10.—Plin. 2, c. 76.——A native of Lampſacus, ſon of Ariſtocles. He was pupil to Diogenes the Cynic, and preceptor to Alexander the Great, of whoſe life, and that of Philip, he wrote the hiſtory. When Alexander, in a fit of anger, threatened to put to death all the inhabitants of Lampſacus, becauſe they had maintained a long ſiege againſt him, Anaximenes was ſent by his countrymen to appeaſe the king, who, as ſoon as he ſaw him, ſwore he would not grant the favor he was going to aſk. Upon this, Anaximenes begged the king to deſtroy the city, and enſlave the inhabitants, and by this artful requeſt the city of Lampſacus was ſaved from deſtruction. Beſides the life of Philip and his ſon, he wrote an hiſtory of Greece in 12 books. His nephew bore the ſame name, and wrote an account of ancient paintings. Pauſ. 6, c. 18.—Val. Max. 7, c. 3.

ANAXIPŎLIS, a comic poet of Thaſos. Plin. 14, c. 14.——A writer on agriculture, likewiſe on Thaſos.

ANAXIPPUS, a comic writer, in the age of Demetrius. He uſed to ſay, that philoſophers were wiſe only in their ſpeeches, but fools in their actions. Athen.

ANAXIRHOE, a daughter of Coronus, who married Epeus. Pauſ. 5, c. 1.

ANAXIS, a Bœotian hiſtorian, who wrote an hiſtory down to the age of Philip ſon of Amyntas. Diod. 25.

ANAXO, a virgin of Trœzene carried away by Theſeus. Plut. in Theſ.

ANCÆUS, the ſon of Lycurgus and Antinoe, was in the expedition of the Argonauts. He was at the chace of the Calydonian boar, in which he periſhed. Hygin. fab. 173 & 248. Ovid. Met. 8.——The ſon of Neptune and Aſtypalæa. He went with the Argonauts, and ſucceeded Tiphis as pilot of the ſhip Argo. He reigned in Ionia, where he married Samia, daughter of the Mæander, by whom he had four ſons, Perilas, Enudus, Samus, Alitherſus, and one daughter called Parthenope. Orpheus Argon. He was once told by one of his ſervants, whom he preſſed with hard labour in his vineyard, that he never would taſte of the produce of his vines. He had already the cup in his hand, and called the prophet to convince him of his falſehood; when the ſervant, yet firm in his prediction, uttered this well-known proverb, Πολλα μεταξυ πελει κυλικος και χειλεος ακρου.

Multa cadunt inter calicem ſupremaque labra.

And that very moment Ancæus was told that a wild boar had entered his vineyard; upon which, he threw down the cup, and ran to drive away the wild beaſt. He was killed in the attempt.

ANCALĪTES, a people of Britain near the Trinobantes. Cæſ. bell. G. 5, c. 21.

ANCHION. Vid. Chion.

ANCHISE, a city of Italy. Dionyſ. Hal.

ANCHĪSES, a ſon of Capys by Themis, daughter of Ilus. He was of ſuch a beautiful complexion, that Venus came down from from heaven on mount Ida to enjoy his company. The goddeſs became pregnant, and forbade Anchiſes ever to mention the favors he had received, on pain of being ſtruck with thunder. The child which Venus brought forth, was called Æneas; he was educated as ſoon as born by the nymphs of Ida, and, when of a proper age, was entruſted to the care of Chiron the centaur. When Troy was taken, Anchiſes was become ſo infirm that Æneas, to whom the Greeks permitted to take away whatever he eſteemed moſt, carried him through the flames upon his ſhoulders, and thus ſaved his life. He accompanied his ſon in his voyage towards Italy, and died in Sicily in the 80th year of his age. He was buried on mount Eryx, by Æneas and Aceſtes, king of the country, and the anniverſary of his death was afterwards celebrated by his ſon and the Trojans on his tomb. Some authors have maintained, that Anchiſes had forgot the injunctions of Venus, and boaſted at a feaſt, that he enjoyed her favors on mount Ida, upon which he was killed with thunder. Others ſay, that the wounds he received from the thunder were not mortal, and that they only weakened and diſfigured his body. Virgil, in the 6th book of the Æneid, introduces him in the Elyſian fields, relating to his ſon the fates that attended him, and the fortune of his deſcendants, the Romans. [Vid. Æneas.] Virg. Æn. 1, 2, &c.—Hygin. fab. 94, 254, 260, 270.—Heſiod. Theog. v. 1010.—Apollod. 3.—Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 34.—Homer. Il. 20. & Hymn. in Vener.—Xenoph. Cyneg. c. 1.—*Dionyſ. Anchīsia, a mountain of Arcadia, at the bottom of which is a monument of Anchiſes. Pauſ. 8, c. 12 & 13.

Anchoe, a place near the mouth of the Cephiſus, where there is a lake of the ſame name. Strab.

Anchŏra, a fortified place in Galatia.

Anchūrus, a ſon of Midas, king of Phrygia, who ſacrificed himſelf for the good of his country, when the earth had opened and ſwallowed up many buildings. The oracle had been conſulted, and gave for anſwer, that the gulf would never cloſe, if Midas did not throw into it whatever he had moſt precious. Though the king had parted with many things of immenſe value, yet the gulf continued open, till Anchurus, thinking himſelf the moſt precious of his father's poſſeſſions, took a tender leave of his wife and family, and leaped into the earth, which cloſed immediately over his head. Midas erected there an altar of ſtones to Jupiter, and that altar was the firſt object which he turned into gold, when he had received his fatal gift from the gods. This unpoliſhed lump of gold exiſted ſtill in the age of Plutarch. Plut. in Parall.

Ancīle & Ancīle, a ſacred ſhield, which, according to the Roman authors, fell from heaven in the reign of Numa, when the Roman people laboured under a peſtilence. Upon the preſervation of this ſhield depended the fate of the Roman empire, and therefore Numa ordered 11 of the ſame ſize and form to be made, that if ever any attempt was made to carry them away, the plunderer might find it difficult to diſtinguiſh the true one. They were made with ſuch exactneſs, that the king promiſed Veterius Mamurius, the artiſt, whatever reward he deſired. [Vid. Mamurius.] They were kept in the temple of Veſta, and an order of prieſts was choſen to watch over their ſafety. Theſe prieſts were called Salii, and were twelve in number; they carried every year, on the firſt of March, the ſhields in a ſolemn proceſſion round the walls of Rome, dancing and ſinging praiſes to the god Mars. This ſacred feſtival continued three days, during which every important buſineſs was ſtopped. It was deemed unfortunate to be married on thoſe days, or to undertake any expedition, and Tacitus in 1 Hiſt. has attributed the unſucceſsful campaign of the emperor Otho againſt Vitellius, to his leaving Rome during the celebration of the Ancyliorium feſtum. Theſe two verſes of Ovid explain the origin of the word Ancyle, which is applied to theſe ſhields:

Idque ancyle vocat, quod ab omni parte reciſum eſt,
Quemque notes oculis, angulus omnis abeſt.

Ancus Martius, the 4th king of Rome, was grandſon to Numa, by his daughter. He waged a ſucceſsful war againſt the Latins, Veientes, Fidenates, Volſci, and Sabines, and joined mount Janiculum to the city by a bridge, and incloſed mount Martius and the Aventine within the walls of the city. He extended the confines of the Roman territories to the ſea, where he built the town of Oſtia, at the mouth of the Tiber. He inherited the valor of Romulus with the moderation of Numa. He died B. C. 616, after a reign of 24 years, and was ſucceeded by Tarquin the elder. Dionyſ. Hal. 3, c. 9.—Liv. 1, c. 32, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 815.

ANDRAMYTES, a king of Lydia, who caſtrated women, and made uſe of them as eunuchs. Athen.

ANDREAS, a ſtatuary of Argos. Pauſ. 6, c. 16.——A man of Panormum, who wrote an account of all the remarkable events that had happened in Sicily. Athen.——A ſon of Peneus. Part of Greece was called Andreis after him. Pauſ. 9, c. 34, &c.

ANDRICLUS, a mountain of Cilicia. Strab. 14.——A river of Troas, falling into the Scamander. Plin. 5, c. 27.

ANDRISCUS, a man who wrote an hiſtory of Naxos. Athen. 1.——A worthleſs perſon called Pſeudophilippus, on account of the likeneſs of his features to king Philip. He incited the Macedonians to revolt againſt Rome. He was conquered and led in triumph by Metellus, 152 B. C. Flor. 2, c. 14.

ANDROBIUS, a famous painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.

ANDROCLEA, a daughter of Antipoenus of Thebes. She, with her ſiſter Alcida, ſacrificed herſelf in the ſervice of her country, when the oracle had promiſed the victory to her countrymen, who were engaged in a war againſt Orchomenos, if any one of noble birth devoted himſelf for the glory of his nation. Antipoenus refuſed to do it, and his daughters chearfully accepted it. They received great honors after death. Hercules, who fought on the ſide of Thebes, dedicated to them the image of a lion in the temple of Diana. Pauſ. 9, c. 17.

ANDROCLES, a ſon of Phintas who reigned in Meſſenia. Pauſ. 4, c. 5, &c.——A man who wrote an hiſtory of Cyprus.

ANDROCLIDES, a noble Theban who defended the democratical, againſt the encroachments of the oligarchical power. He was killed by one of his enemies.——A ſophiſt in the age of Aurelian, who gave an account of philoſophers.

ANDROCLUS, a ſon of Codrus, who reigned in Ionia, and took Epheſus and Samos. Pauſ. 7, c. 2.

ANDROCȳDES, a phyſician, who wrote the following letter to Alexander:—Vinum potaturus, Rex, memento te bibere ſanguinem terræ, ſicuti venenum eſt homini cicuta, ſic & vinum. Plin. 14, c, 5.

ANDRODAMUS, a man of Rhegium, who gave laws to the Thracians Ariſtot.

ANDRŌGEOS, a Greek, killed by Æneas and his friends whom he took to be his countrymen. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 371.

ANDRŌGEUS, ſon of Minos & Paſiphae, was famous for his ſkill in wreſtling. He overcame every antagoniſt at Athens, and became the favorite of the people. Ægeus king of Athens grew jealous of his popularity, and cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated as he was going to Thebes. Some ſay that he was killed by the wild bull of Marathon. Minos declared war againſt Athens to revenge the death of his ſon, and peace was at laſt re-eſtabliſhed on condition that Ægeus ſent yearly ſeven boys and ſeven girls from Athens to Crete to be devoured by the minotaur. [Vid. Minotaurus.] The Athenians eſtabliſhed feſtivals by order of Minos, in honor of his ſon, and called them Androgeia. Hygin. fab. 41.—Diod. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 20.—Pauſ. 1, c. 1, & 27.—Apollod. 2, c. 5, l. 3, c. 1 & 15.—Plut. in Theſ.

ANDROGȳNÆ, a nation of Africa, beyond the Naſamones. Every one of them bears the characteriſtics of the male and female ſex; and one of their breaſts is that of a man, and the other that of a woman. Plin. 7, c. 2.

ANDRŎMĂCHE, daughter of Eetion, king of Thebes in Cilicia, married Hector ſon of Priam king of Troy, by whom ſhe had Aſtyanax. She was ſo fond of her huſband that ſhe even fed his horſes with her own hand. During the Trojan war ſhe remained at home employed in her domeſtic concerns. Her parting with Hector, who was going to a battle, in which he periſhed, has always been deemed the beſt, moſt tender and pathetic of all the paſſages in Homer's Iliad. She received the news of her huſband's death with extreme ſorrow; and after the taking of Troy, ſhe had the misfortune to ſee her only ſon Aſtyanax, after ſhe had ſaved him from the flames, thrown headlong from the walls of the city, by the hands of the man whoſe father had killed her huſband (Senec. in Troad.) Andromache, in the diviſion of the priſoners by the Greeks, fell to the ſhare of Neoptolemus, who treated her as his wife, and carried her to Epirus. He had by her three ſons, Moloſſus, Piclus & Pergamus, and afterwards repudiated her. After this divorce ſhe married Helenus ſon of Priam, who, as herſelf, was a captive of Pyrrhus. She reigned with him over part of the country, and became mother by him of Ceſtrinus. Some ſay that Aſtyanax was killed by Ulyſſes, and Euripides ſays that Menelaus put him to death. Homer Il. 6, 22 & 24.—Q. Calab. 1.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 486.—Hygin. fab. 123.—Dares Phryg.—*Ovid. ANDROMACHIDÆ, a nation who preſented to their king all the virgins who were of nubile years, and permitted him to uſe them as he pleaſed.

ANDROMĂCHUS, an opulent perſon of Sicily, father to the hiſtorian Timæus. Diod. 16. He aſſiſted Timoleon in recovering the liberty of the Syracuſans.—A general of Alexander, to whom Parmenio gave the government of Syria. He was burnt alive by the Samaritans. Curt. 4, c. 5 & 8.——An officer of Seleucus the younger. Polyæn. 4.——A poet of Byzantium.——A phyſician of Crete in the age of Nero.——A ſophiſt of Naples, in the age of Dioclefian.

ANDROMĂDAS, a native of Rhegium, who made laws for the Thracians concerning the puniſhment of homicide, &c. Ariſtot.

ANDRŎMĪDA, a daughter of Cepheus king of Æthiopia, by Caſſiope. She was promiſed in marriage to Phineus, her uncle, when Neptune drowned the kingdom, and ſent a ſea monſter to ravage the country, becauſe Caſſiope had boaſted herſelf fairer than Juno and the Nereides. The oracle of Jupiter Ammon was conſulted, and nothing could ſtop the reſentment of Neptune, if Andromeda was not expoſed to the ſea monſter. She was accordingly tied naked on a rock, and at the moment that the monſter was going to devour her, Perſeus, who returned through the air from the conqueſt of the Gorgons, ſaw her, and was captivated with her beauty. He promiſed to deliver her and deſtroy the monſter, if he received her in marriage as a reward for his trouble. Cepheus conſented, and Perſeus changed the ſea monſter into a rock, by ſhewing him Meduſa's head, and untied Andromeda and married her. He had by her many children, among whom were Sthenelus, Ancæus, and Electryon. The marriage of Andromeda with Perſeus was oppoſed by Phineus, who after a bloody battle was changed into a ſtone by Perſeus. Some ſay that Minerva made Andromeda a conſtellation in heaven after her death. Vid. Meduſa. Perſeus. Hygin. fab. 64.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 43.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Manil. 5, v. 533.—Propert. 3, el. 21.—— According to Pliny, l. 5, c. 31, it was at Joppa in Judæa that Andromeda was tied on a rock. He mentions that the ſkeleton of the huge ſea monſter, to whom ſhe had been expoſed, was brought to Rome by Scaurus, and carefully preſerved. The fable of Andromeda and the ſea monſter has been explained, by ſuppoſing that ſhe was courted by the captain of a ſhip, who attempted to carry her away, but was prevented by the interpoſition of another more faithful lover.

ANDRON, an Argive, who travelled all over the deſarts of Libya without drink. Ariſtot. 1, de ebriet.——A man ſet over the citadel of Syracuſe by Dionyſius. Hermocrates adviſed him to ſeize it and revolt from the tyrant, which he refuſed to do. ANITORGIS, a city of Spain, near which a battle was fought between Aſdrubal and the Scipios. Liv. 25, c. 33.

ANIUS, ſon of Apollo and Rhea, was king of Delos, and father of Andrus. He had by Dorippe three daughters, Oeno, Spermo, and Elais, to whom Bacchus had given the power of changing whatever they pleaſed into wine, corn, and oil. When Agamemnon went to the Trojan war, he wiſhed to carry them with him to ſupply his army with proviſions; but they complained to Bacchus, who changed them into doves. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 642.—Dionyſ. Hal. 1.—Diod. 5.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 80.

ANNA, a goddeſs, in whoſe honor the Romans have inſtituted feſtivals. She was, according to ſome, Anna the daughter of Belus and ſiſter of Dido, who, after her ſiſter's death, fled from Carthage, which Jarbas had beſieged, and came to Italy, where Æneas met her, as he walked on the the banks of the Tiber, and gave her an honorable reception, for the kindneſſes ſhe had ſhewn him when he was at Carthage. Lavinia, the wife of Æneas, was jealous of the tender treatment which was ſhewn to Anna, and meditated her ruin. Anna was apprized of this by her ſiſter in a dream, and ſhe fled to the river Numicus, of which ſhe became a deity, and ordered the inhabitants of the country to call her Anna Perenna, becauſe ſhe would remain for ever under the waters. Her feſtivals were performed with many rejoicings, and the females often, in the midſt of their chearfulneſs, forgot their natural decency. They were introduced into Rome, and celebrated the 15th of March. The Romans generally ſacrificed to her, to obtain a long and happy life: and hence the words Annare & Perennare. Some have ſuppoſed Anna to be the moon, quia menſibus impleat annum; others call her Themis, or Io, the daughter of Inachus, and ſometimes Maia. Another more received opinion maintains, that Anna was an old induſtrious woman of Bovillæ, who, when the Roman populace had fled from the city to mount Sacer, brought them cakes every day; for which kind treatment the Romans, when peace was re-eſtabliſhed, decreed immortal honors to her whom they called Perenna, ab perennitate cultûs, and who, as they ſuppoſe, was become one of their deities. Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 653, &c.—Sil. 8, v. 79—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 9, 20, 421, & 500.

Anna Commena, a princeſs of Conſtantinople, known to the world for the Greek hiſtory which ſhe wrote of her father Alexius emperor of the eaſt. The character of this hiſtory is not very high either for authenticity or beauty of compoſition: the hiſtorian is loſt in the daughter; and inſtead of ſimplicity of ſtyle and narrative, as Gibbon ſays, an elaborate affection of rhetoric and ſcience betrays in every page the vanity of a female author. The beſt edition of Anna Commena, is that of Paris, folio, 1651.

Annāles, a chronological hiſtory which gives an account of all the important events of every year in a ſtate, without entering into the cauſes which produced them. The annals of Tacitus may be conſidered in this light. In the firſt ages of Rome, the writing of the annals was one of the duties and privileges of the high-prieſt; whence they have been called Annales Maximi, from the prieſt Pontifex Maximus, who conſecrated them, and gave them as truly genuine and authentic.

Annālis lex ſettled the age at which, among the Romans, a citizen could be admitted to exerciſe the offices of the ſtate. This law originated in Athens, and was introduced in Rome. No man could be a knight before 18 years of age, nor be inveſted with the conſular power before he had arrived to his 25th year.

Annianus, a poet in the age of Trajan.

Annĭbal, a celebrated Carthaginian general, ſon of Amilcar. He was educated in his father's camp, and inured from his early years to the labors of the field. He paſſed into Spain when nine years old, and at the requeſt of his father, took a ſolemn oath he never would be at peace with the Romans. After his father's death, he was appointed over the cavalry in Spain; and ſome time after, upon the death of Aſdrubal, he was inveſted with the command of all the armies of Carthage, though not yet in the 25th year of his age. In three years of continual ſucceſs, he ſubdued all the nations of Spain which oppoſed the Carthaginian power, and took Saguntum after a ſiege of eight months. This city was in alliance with the Romans, and its fall was the cauſe of the ſecond Punic war, which Annibal prepared to ſupport with all the courage and prudence of a conſummate general. He levied three large armies, one of which he ſent to Africa, he left another in Spain, and marched at the head of the third towards Italy. This army ſome have calculated at 20,000 foot and 6,000 horſe, others ſay that it conſiſted of 100,000 foot and 20,000 horſe. Liv. 21, c. 38. He came to the Alps, which were deemed almoſt inacceſſible, and had never been paſſed over before him but by Hercules, and after much trouble gained the top in nine days. He conquered the uncivilized inhabitants that oppoſed his paſſage, and after the amazing loſs of 30,000 men, made his way ſo eaſy, by ſoftening the rocks with fire and vinegar, that even his armed elephants deſcended the mountains without danger or difficulty, where a man without his arms could not walk before in ſafety. He was oppoſed by the Romans as ſoon as he entered Italy; and after he had defeated P. Corn. Scipio and Sempronius, near the Rhone, the Po, and the Trebia, he croſſed the Apennines, and invaded Etruria. He defeated the army of the conſul Flaminius near the lake Traſimenus, and ſoon after met the two conſuls C. Terentius and L. Æmilius at Cannæ. His army conſiſted of 40,000 foot and 10,000 horſe, when he engaged the Romans at the celebrated battle of Cannæ. The ſlaughter was ſo great that no leſs than 40,000 Romans were killed, and the conqueror made a bridge with the dead carcaſes; and as a ſign of his victory, he ſent to Carthage three buſhels of gold rings which had been taken from 5630 Roman knights ſlain in the battle. Had Annibal, immediately after the battle, marched his army to the gates of Rome, it muſt have yielded amidſt the general conſternation, if we believe the opinions of ſome writers; but his delay gave the enemy ſpirit and boldneſs, and when at laſt he approached the walls, he was informed that the piece of ground on which his army then ſtood, was ſelling at a high price in the Roman forum. After hovering for ſome time round the city, he retired to Capua, where the Carthaginian ſoldiers ſoon forgot to conquer in the pleaſures and riot of this luxurious city. From that circumſtance it has been ſaid, and with propriety, that Capua was a Cannæ to Annibal. After the battle of Cannæ the Romans became more cautious, and when the dictator Fabius Maximus had defied the artifice as well as the valor of Annibal, they began to look for better times. Marcellus, who ſucceeded Fabius in the field, firſt taught the Romans that Annibal was not invincible. After many important debates in the ſenate, it was decreed, that war ſhould be carried into Africa, to remove Annibal from the gates of Rome, and Scipio, who was the firſt propoſer of the plan, was empowered to put it into execution. When Carthage ſaw the enemy on her coaſts, ſhe recalled Annibal from Italy; and that great general is ſaid to have left, with tears in his eyes, a country, which during ſixteen years he had kept under continual alarms, and which he could almoſt call his own. He and Scipio met near Carthage, and after a parley, in which neither would give the preference to his enemy, they determined to come to a general engagement. The battle was fought near Zama: Scipio made a great ſlaughter of the enemy, 20,000 were killed, and the ſame number made priſoners. Annibal, after he had loſt the day, fled to Adrumetum. Soon after this deciſive battle, the Romans granted peace to Carthage, on hard conditions; and afterwards Annibal, who was jealous and apprehenſive of the Roman power, fled to Syria, to king Antiochus, whom he adviſed to make war againſt Rome, and lead an army into the heart of Italy. Antiochus diſtruſted the fidelity of Annibal, and was conquered by the Romans, who granted him peace on the condition of his delivering their immortal enemy into their hands. Annibal, who was apprized of this, left the court of Antiochus, and fled to Pruſias, king of Bithynia. He encouraged him to declare war againſt Rome, and even aſſiſted him in weakening the power of Eumenes, king of Pergamus, who was in alliance with the Romans. The ſenate received intelligence that Annibal was in Bithynia, and immediately ſent ambaſſadors, amongſt whom was L. Q. Flaminius, to demand him of Pruſias. The king was unwilling to betray Annibal, and violate the laws of hoſpitality, and at the ſame time he dreaded the power of Rome: but Annibal extricated him from his embarraſſment, and when he heard that his houſe was beſieged on every ſide, and every means of eſcape fruitleſs, he took a doſe of poiſon, which he always carried with him in a ring on his finger, and as he breathed his laſt, he exclaimed, Solvamus diuturnâ curâ populum Romanum, quando mortem ſenis expectare longum cenſet. He died in his 70th year, according to ſome, about 183 years B. C. That year was famous for the death of the three greateſt generals of the age, Annibal, Scipio, and Philopœmen. The death of that great man was not the cauſe of great rejoicings in Rome; he had always been a profeſſed enemy to the Roman name, and ever endeavoured to deſtroy its power. If he ſhone in the field, he alſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſtudies. He was taught the Greek by Soſilus a Lacedæmonian, and he even wrote ſome books in Greek on different ſubjects. It is remarkable, that the life of Annibal, whom the Romans wiſhed ſo many times to deſtroy by perfidy, was never attempted by any of his ſoldiers or countrymen. He made himſelf as conſpicuous in the government of the ſtate, as at the head of armies; and though his enemies reproached him with the rudeneſs of laughing in the Carthaginian ſenate, while every ſenator was bathed in tears for the misfortunes of their country, Annibal defended himſelf by ſaying, that he, who had been bred all his life in a camp, ought to be diſpenſed with all the more poliſhed ſcelings of a capital. He was ſo apprehenſive for his ſafety, that when he was in Bithynia, his houſe was fortified like a caſtle, and on every ſide there were ſecret doors which could give immediate eſcape if his life was ever attempted. When he quitted Italy, and embarked on board a veſſel for Africa, he ſo ſtrongly ſuſpected the fidelity of his pilot, who told him that the lofty mountain which appeared at a diſtance was a promontory of Sicily, that he killed him on the ſpot; and when he was convinced of his fatal error, he gave a magnificent burial to the man whom he had ſo falſely murdered, and called the promontory by his name. The labors which he ſuſtained, and the inclemency of the weather to which he expoſed himſelf in croſſing the Alps, ſo weakened one of his eyes, that he ever after loſt the uſe of it. The Romans have celebrated the humanity of Annibal, who, after the battle of Cannæ, ſought the body of the Roman conſul amidſt the heaps of ſlain, and honored it with a funeral funeral which became a general. He performed the same friendly offices to the remains of Marcellus and Tib. Gracchus, who had fallen in battle. He often blamed the unsettled measures of his country; and when the enemy had thrown into his camp the head of his brother Asdrubal, whom the Romans had conquered as he came from Spain with a reinforcement into Italy, Annibal said that the Carthaginian arms would no longer meet with their usual success. Juvenal, in speaking of Annibal, observes, that the ring which caused his death made a due atonement to the Romans for the many thousand rings which had been sent to Carthage from the battle of Cannæ. Annibal, when in Spain, married a woman of Castulo. The Romans entertained such a high opinion of him as a commander, that Scipio who conquered him, calls him the greatest general that ever lived, and gives the second rank to Pyrrhus the Epirot, and places himself the next to these in merit and abilities. It is plain that the failure of Annibal's expedition in Italy, did not arise from his neglect, but from that of his countrymen, who gave him no assistance; far from imitating their enemies of Rome, who even raised in one year 18 legions to oppose the formidable Carthaginian. Livy has painted the character of Annibal like an enemy, and it is much to be lamented that a great historian has withheld the tribute due to the merits and virtues of the greatest general. *C. ANTĒNOR, a Trojan prince related to Priam. It is ſaid that during the Trojan war, he always kept a ſecret correſpondence with the Greeks, and chiefly with Menelaus and Ulyſſes. In the council of Priam, Homer introduces him as adviſing the Trojans to reſtore Helen, and conclude the war. He adviſed Ulyſſes to carry away the Trojan palladium, and encouraged the Greeks to make the wooden horſe, which, at his perſuaſion, was brought into the city of Troy by a breach made in the walls. Æneas has been accuſed of being a partner of his guilt; and the night that Troy was taken, they had a number of Greeks ſtationed at the doors of their houſes to protect them from harm. After the deſtruction of his country, Antenor migrated to Italy near the Adriatic, where he built the town of Padua. His children were alſo concerned in the Trojan war, and diſplayed much valor againſt the Greeks. Their names were Polybius, Acamas, Agenor, and according to others, Polydamas & Helicaon. Liv. 1. c. 1.—Plin. 3, c. 13.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 242.—Tacit. 16, c. 21.—Homer. Il. 3, 7, 8, 11.—Ovid. Met. 13.—Dictys. Cret. 5.—Dares Phryg. 6.—Strab. 13.—Dionyſ. Hal. 1.—Pauſ. 10, c. 27.——A ſtatuary. Pauſ.——A Cretan who wrote an hiſtory of his country. Ælian.

ANTENORIDES, a patronymic given to the three ſons of Antenor, all killed during the Trojan war. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 484.

ANTĒROS, (ἀντι ἐρως, againſt love) a ſon of Mars & Venus. He was not, as the deriſion of his name implies, a deity that preſided over an oppoſition to love, but he was the god of mutual love and of mutual tenderneſs. Venus had complained to Themis, that her ſon Cupid always continued a child, and was told, that if he had another brother, he would grow up in a ſhort ſpace of time. As ſoon as Anteros was born, Cupid felt his ſtrength increaſe, and his wings enlarge; but if ever his brother was at a diſtance from him, he found himſelf reduced to his ancient ſhape. From this circumſtance it is ſeen, that return of paſſion gives vigor to love. Anteros had a temple at Athens raiſed to his honor, when Meles had experienced the coldneſs and diſdain of Timagoras, whom he paſſionately eſteemed, and for whom he had killed himſelf. [Vid. Meles.] Cupid and Anteros are often repreſented ſtriving to ſeize a palm-tree from one another, to teach us that true love always endeavours to overcome by kindneſs and gratitude. They were always painted in the Greek academies, to inform the ſcholars that it is their immediate duty to be grateful to their teachers, and to reward their troubles with love and reverence. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.—Pauſ. 1, c. 30. l. 6, c. 23.——A grammarian of Alexandria, in the age of the emperor Claudius.

ANTHĒA, a town of Achaia. Pauſ. 7, c. 18.—Of Meſſenia. Id. 4, c. 31.—Of Trœzene. Id. 2, c. 30.

ANTHEAS, a ſon of Eumelus, killed in attempting to ſow corn from the chariot of Triptolemus drawn by dragons. Pauſ. 7, c. 18.

ANTHĒDON, a city of Bœotia, which receives its name from the flowery plains that ſurround it, or Anthedon, a certain nymph. Pauſ. 7, c. 10. l. 9, c. 22.—It was formerly inhabited by Thracians. Homer. Il. 2.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 905.——A port of Peloponneſus. Plin. 4, c. 5.

ANTHĒLA, a town near the Aſopus. Ceres and Amphictyon had a temple in its neighbourhood. Herodot. 7, c. 176.

ANTHĔMIS, an iſland in the Mediterranean, the ſame as the Ionian Samos. Strab. 10.

ANTHEMON, a Trojan. Homer. Il. 4.

ANTHĒNE, a town of Peloponneſus. Thucyd. 5, c. 41.

ANTHERMUS, a Chian ſculptor, ſon of Micciades, and grandſon to Malas. He and his brother Bupalus made a ſtatue of the poet Hipponax, which cauſed univerſal laughter, on account of the deformity of its countenance. The poet was ſo incenſed upon this, and inveighed with ſo much bitterneſs againſt the ſtatuaries, that they hung themſelves. Plin. 36, c. 5.

ANTHIA,

ANTHES, a native of Anthedon, who first invented hymns. Plut. de Muſ.——A ſon of Neptune.

ANTHESPHORIA, feſtivals celebrated in Sicily, in honor of Proſerpine, who was carried away by Pluto as ſhe was gathering flowers. Claudian de Rapt. Proſ.——Feſtivals of the ſame name were alſo obſerved at Argos in honor of Juno, who was called Antheia. Pauſ. Corinth.—Pollux. Onom. 1, c. 1.

ANTHESTERIA, feſtivals in honor of Bacchus among the Greeks. They were celebrated in the month of February, called Anthesterion, whence the name is derived. They continued 3 days. The firſt day was called Πιθοιγια, απο του πιθους ουγειν, becauſe they tapped their barrels of liquor. The ſecond day was called Χοες, from the meaſure χοα, becauſe every individual drank of his own veſſel, in commemoration of the arrival of Oreſtes, who, after the murder of his mother, came, without being purified, to Demophoon, or Pandion, king of Athens, and was obliged with all the Athenians to drink by himſelf, for fear of polluting the people by drinking with them before he was purified of the parricide. It was uſual on that day, to ride out in chariots, and ridicule thoſe that paſſed by. The beſt drinker was rewarded with a crown of leaves, or rather of gold, and with a caſk of wine. The third day was called χυτροι, from χυτρα, a veſſel brought out full of all ſorts of ſeed and herbs, ſeemed ſacred to Mercury, and therefore not touched. The ſlaves had the permiſſion of being merry and free during theſe feſtivals; and at the end of the ſolemnity a herald proclaimed, Θυραζε, Καρες, ουκετ' Ανθεστηρια; i. e. Depart, ye Carian ſlaves, the feſtivals are at an end. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 41.

ANTHEUS, a ſon of Antenor, much eſteemed by Paris.——One of the companions of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 514.

ANTHIA, a ſiſter of Priam, ſeized by the Greeks. She compelled the people of Pallene to burn their ſhips, and build Scione. Polyæn. 7, c. 47.——A town. Vid. Anthea.——A daughter of Theſpius, miſtreſs to Hercules. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

ANTHIAS. Vid. Antheas.

ANTHIUM, a town of Thrace, afterwards called Apollonia. Plin. 4, c. 11.——A city of Italy.

ANTHIUS, (flowery), a name of Bacchus worſhipped at Athens. He had alſo a ſtatue at Patræ.

ANTHO, a daughter of Amulius, king of Alba.

ANTHORES, a companion of Hercules, who followed Evander, and ſettled in Italy. He was killed in the war of Turnus againſt Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 778.

ANTHRACIA, a nymph. Pauſ. 8, c. 31.

ANTHROPINUS, Tiſarchus, and Diocles, three perſons who laid ſnares for Agathocles tyrant of Sicily. Polyæn. 5, c. 3.

ANTHROPOPHAGI, a people of Scythia that feed on human fleſh. They live near the country of the Meſſagetæ. Plin. 4, c. 12. l. 6, c. 30.—Mela. 2, c. 1.

ANTHYLLA, a city of Egypt, on the Canopic mouth of the Nile. It maintained the queens of the country in ſhoes, or, according to Athenæus 1. in girdles. Herodot. 2, c. 98.

ANTIA LEX was made for the ſuppreſſion of luxury at Rome. Its particulars are not known. The enactor was Antius Reſtio, who afterwards never ſupped abroad for fear of being himſelf a witneſs of the profuſion and extravagance which his law meant to deſtroy, but without effect.

ANTIANIRA, the mother of Echion.

ANTIAS, the goddeſs of fortune, chiefly worſhipped at Antium.

ANTICLEA, a daughter of Autolycus and Amphithea. Her father, who was a famous robber, permitted Siſyphus, ſon of Æolus, to enjoy the favors of his daughter, and Anticlea was really pregnant of Ulyſſes when ſhe married Laertes king of Ithaca. Laertes was nevertheleſs the reputed father of Ulyſſes. Ulyſſes is reproached by Ajax in Ovid. Met. as being the ſon of Siſyphus. It is ſaid that Anticlea killed herſelf when ſhe heard a falſe report of her ſon's death. Homer. Od. 11. 19.—Hygin. fab. 201, 243.—Pauſ. 10, c. 29.——A woman who had Periphetes by Vulcan. Apollod. 3.——A daughter of Diocles, who married Machaon the ſon of Æſculapius, by whom ſhe had Nicomachus and Gorgaſus. Pauſ. 4, c. 30.

ANTICLES, an Athenian archon.——A man who conſpired againſt Alexander with Hermolaus. Curt. 8, c. 6.——An Athenian victor at Olympia.

ANTICLIDES, a Greek hiſtorian, whoſe works are now loſt. They are often quoted by Athenæus. & Plut. in Alex.

ANTICRAGUS, a mountain of Lycia, oppoſite mount Cragus. Strab. 4.

ANTICRATES, a Spartan, who ſtabbed Epaminondas, the Theban general, at the battle of Mantinea. Plut. in Ageſ.

ANTICYRA, two towns of Greece, the one in Phocis, and the other near mount Oeta, both famous for the ellebore which they produced. This plant was of infinite ſervice to cure diſeaſes, and particularly inſanity; hence the proverb Naviget Anticyram. The Anticyra of Phocis was anciently called Cypariſſa. It had a temple of Neptune, who was repreſented holding a trident in one hand and reſting the other on his ſide, with one of his feet on a dolphin. Some writers, eſpecially Horace (Art. p. 300), ſpeak of three iſlands of this name, but this ſeems to be a miſtake. Pauſ. 10, c. 36.—Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 166. De Art. Poet. v. 300.—Perſius, 4, v. 16.—Strab. 9.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Ovid. Pont. 4, ep. 3, v. 53.——A miſtreſs of Demetrius. Plut. in Demetr.

ANTIDŌTUS, an excellent painter, pupil of Euphranon. Plin. 35, c. 11.

ANTIDŌMUS, a warlike ſoldier of king Philip at the ſiege of Perinthus.

ANTIGĒNES, one of Alexander's generals, publicly rewarded for his valor. Curt. 5, c. 14.

ANTIGENĪDAS, a famous muſician of Thebes, diſciple to Philoxenus. He taught his pupil Iſmenias to deſpiſe the judgment of the populace. Cic. in Brut.

ANTIGŌNA, daughter of Berenice, was wife to king Pyrrhus. Plut. in Pyrrh.

ANTIGŌNE, a daughter of Œdipus, king of Thebes, by his mother Iocaſta. She buried by night her brother Polynices, againſt the poſitive orders of Creon, who, when he heard of it, ordered her to be buried alive. She however killed herſelf before the ſentence was executed; and Hæmon, the king's ſon, who was paſſionately fond of her, and had not been able to obtain her pardon, killed himſelf on her grave. The death of Antigone is the ſubject of one of the tragedies of Sophocles. The Athenians were ſo pleaſed with it at the firſt repreſentation, that they preſented the author with the government of Samos. This tragedy was repreſented 32 times at Athens without interruption. Suphocl. in Antig.—Hygin. fab. 67, 72. 243, 254.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. Triſt. 3, el. 3.—Philoſtrat. 2, c. 29.—Stat. Theb. 12.——A daughter of Eurytion king of Phthia in Theſſaly. Apollod.——A daughter of Laomedon. She was the ſiſter of Priam, and was changed into a ſtork for comparing herſelf to Juno. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 93.

ANTIGŌNIA, an inland town of Epirus. Plin. 4, c. 1.——One of Macedonia. founded by Antigonus, ſon of Gonatas. Id. 4, c. 10.——One in Syria on the borders of the Orontes. Strab. 16——Another in Bithynia, called alſo Nicæa. Id. 12.——Another in Arcadia, anciently called Mantinea. Pauſ. 8, c. 8.——One of Troas in Aſia Minor. Strab. 13.

ANTIGŌNUS, one of Alexander's generals, univerſally ſuppoſed to be the illegitimate ſon of Philip, Alexander's father. In the diviſion of the provinces after the king's death, he received Pamphylia, Lycia, and Phrygia. He united with Antipater and Ptolemy, to deſtroy Perdiccas and Eumenes; and after the death of Perdiccas, he made continual war againſt Eumenes, whom, after three years of various fortune, he took priſoner, and ordered to be ſtarved. He afterwards declared war againſt Caſſander, whom he conquered, and had ſeveral engagements by his generals with Lyſimachus. He obliged Seleucus to retire from Syria, and fly for refuge and ſafety to Egypt. Ptolemy, who had eſtabliſhed himſelf in Egypt, promiſed to defend Seleucus, and from that time all friendſhip ceaſed between Ptolemy and Antigonus, and a new war was begun, in which Demetrius, the ſon of Antigonus, conquered the fleet of Ptolemy near the iſland of Cyprus, and took 16,000 men priſoners, and ſunk 200 ſhips. After this famous naval battle, which happened 26 years after Alexander's death, Antigonus and his ſon aſſumed the title of kings, and their example was followed by all the reſt of Alexander's generals. The power of Antigonus was now become ſo formidable that Ptolemy, Seleucus, Caſſander, and Lyſimachus, combined together to deſtroy him; yet Antigonus deſpiſed them, and ſaid, that he would diſperſe them as birds. He attempted to enter Egypt in vain, and gained many victories over them; but at laſt he received ſo many wounds in a battle that he could not ſurvive them, and died in the 80th year of his age, 301 B. C. During his life, he was maſter of all Aſia Minor, as far as Syria; but after his death, his ſon Demetrius loſt Aſia, and eſtabliſhed himſelf in Macedonia after the death of Caſſander, and ſome time after attempted to recover his former poſſeſſions, but died in captivity, in the court of his ſon-in-law, Seleucus. Antigonus was concerned in the different intrigues of the Greeks. He made a treaty of alliance with the Ætolians, and was highly reſpected by the Athenians, to whom he ſhewed himſelf very liberal and indulgent. Antigonus diſcharged ſome of his officers becauſe they ſpent their time in taverns, and he gave their commiſſions to common ſoldiers, who performed their duty with punctuality. A certain poet called him divine; but the king deſpiſed his flattery, and bade him go and enquire of his ſervants whether he was really what he ſuppoſed him. Strab. 13.—Diod. 17, &c.—Pauſ. 1, c. 6, &c.—Juſtin. 13, 14. & 15.—C. Nep. in Eumen.—Plut. in Demetr. Eumen. & Arat.——Gonatas, ſon of Demetrius, and grandſon to Antigonus, was king of Macedonia. He reſtored the Armenians to liberty, conquered the Gauls, and at laſt was expelled by Pyrrhus, who ſeized his kingdom. After the death of Pyrrhus, he recovered Macedonia, and died after a reign of 34 years, leaving his ſon Demetrius to ſucceed, B. C. 243. Juſtin. 21 & 25.—Polyb.—Plut. in Demetr.——The guardian of his nephew, Philip, the ſon of Demetrius, who married the widow of Demetrius, and uſurped the kingdom. He was called Do-ion, from his promising much and giving nothing. He conquered Cleomenes king of Sparta, and obliged him to retire into Egypt, because he favoured the Ætolians against the Greeks. He died B. C. 221, after a reign of 11 years, leaving his crown to the lawful possessor, Philip, who distinguished himself by his cruelties and the war he made against the Romans. Justin. 28 & 29.—Polyb. 2.—Plut. in Coom.——A son of Aristobulus king of Judæa. Who obtained an army from the king of Parthia, by promising him 1000 talents and 500 women; and with these foreign troops he attacked his country, and cut the ears of Hyrcanus to make him unfit for the priesthood. Herod, with the aid of the Romans, took him prisoner, and he was put to death by Antony. Josepb. 14. Dion. & Plut. in Anton.——Carystius, an historian in the age of Philadelphus, who wrote the lives of some of the ancient philosophers. Dig. Athen.——A writer on agriculture.——A statuary who wrote on his profession.

ANTILCO, a tyrant of Chalcis. After his death, oligarchy prevailed in that city. Aristot. 5, Polit.

ANTILIBANUS, a mountain of Syria opposite mount Libanus; near which the Orontes flows. Strab.—Plin. 5, c. 20.

ANTILŎCHUS, a king of Messenia.—The eldest son of Nestor by Eurydice. He went to the Trojan war with his father, and was killed by Memnon the son of Aurora. Homer. Od. 4. Ovid Heroid says he was killed by Hector.—A poet who wrote a panegyric upon Lysander, and received a hat filled with silver. Plut. in Lys.——An historian commended by Dionys. Hal.

ANTIMĂCHUS, a lascivious person.—An historian.—A Greek poet of Ionia in the age of Socrates. He wrote a treatise on the age and genealogy of Homer, and proved him to be a native of Colophon. He repeated one of his compositions before a large audience, but his diction was so obscure and unintelligible that all retired except Plato; upon which he said, Legam nihilominus, Plato enim mihi est unus instar omnium. He was reckoned the next to Homer in excellence, and the emperor Adrian was so fond of his poetry that he preferred him to Homer. He wrote a poem upon the Theban war; and before he had brought his heroes to the city of Thebes, he had filled 24 volumes. He was firnamed Clarius from Claros, a mountain near Colophon, where he was born. Paus. 9, c. 35. Plut. in Lysand. & Timol.—Propert. 2, el. 3, v. 45.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.——Another poet of the same name, firnamed Pisecas, because he praised himself.—A Trojan, whom Iris bribed to oppose the restoring of Helen to Menelaus and Ulysses, who had come as ambassadors to recover her. His sons, Hippolochus and Pisander, were killed by Agamemnon. Homer Il. 11 & 12.——A son of Hercules by a daughter of Thestius. Apollod. 2 & 3.——A native of Heliopolis, who wrote a poem on the creation of the world, in 3780 verses.

ANTIMĔNES, a son of Deiphon. Paus. 2, c. 28.

ANTINOEIA, annual sacrifices and quinquennial games in honor of Antinous, instituted by the emperor Adrian at Mantinea, where Antinous was worshipped as a divinity.

ANTINOPŎLIS, a town of Egypt, built in honor of Antinous.

ANTINOUS, a youth of Bithynia, of whom the emperor Adrian was so extremely fond, that at his death he erected a temple to him, and wished it to be believed that he had been changed into a constellation. Some writers suppose that Antinous was drowned in the Nile, while others maintain that he offered himself at a sacrifice as a victim, in honor of the emperor.——A native of Ithaca, son of Eupeithes. He was one of Penelope's suitors. He was brutal and cruel in his manners; and advised his companions to destroy Telemachus, whose advice comforted his mother Penelope. When Ulysses returned home, he came to the palace in a beggar's dress, and begged for bread, which Antinous refused, and even struck him. After Ulysses had discovered himself to Telemachus and Eumæus, he attacked the suitors, who were ignorant who he was, and killed Antinous among the first. Homer. Od. 1, 16, 17 & 22.—Propert. 2, el. 5.

ANTIŎCHIA, the name of a Syrian province. Mela. 1, c. 14.——A city of Syria, once the third city of the world for beauty, greatness, and population. It was built by Antiochus and Seleucus Nicanor, partly on a hill, and partly in a plain. It has the river Orontes in its neighbourhood, with a celebrated grove called Daphne; whence, for the sake of distinction, it has been called Antiochia near Daphne. Dionys. Perieg.——A city called also Nisibis, in Mesopotamia, was built by Seleucus, son of Antiochus.—The capital of Pisidia, 92 miles at the east of Ephesus.—A city on mount Cragus.—Another near the river Tragus, 25 leagues from Seleucia, on the west.—Another in Margiana, called Alexandria & Seleucis.—Another near mount Taurus, on the confines of Syria.—Another of Caria, on the river Meander.

ANTIŎCHIS, the name of the mother of Antiochus the son of Seleucus.—A tribe of Athens.

ANTIŎCHUS, firnamed Soter, was son of Seleucus, and king of Syria and Asia. He made a treaty of alliance with Ptolemy Philadelphus, ladelphus, king of Egypt. He fell into a lingering diſeaſe, which none of his father's phyſicians could cure for ſome time, till it was diſcovered that his pulſe was more irregular than uſual when Stratonice his ſtepmother entered his room, and that love for her was the cauſe of his illneſs. This was told to the father, who willingly gave Stratonice to his ſon, that his immoderate love might not cauſe his death. He died 291 B. C. after a reign of 19 years. Juſtin. 17, c. 2, &c.—Val. Max. 5.—Polyb. 4.—Appian.——The ſecond of that name, ſirnamed Theos (God) by the Mileſians, becauſe he put to death their tyrant Timarchus, was ſon and ſucceſſor of Antiochus Soter. He put an end to the war which had been begun with Ptolemy; and, to ſtrengthen the peace, he married Berenice, the daughter of the Egyptian king. This ſo offended his former wife Laodice, by whom he had two ſons, that ſhe poiſoned him, and ſuborned Artemon, whoſe features were ſimilar to his, to repreſent him as king. Artemon, ſubſervient to her will, pretended to be indiſpoſed, and, as king, called all the miniſters, and recommended to them Seleucus, ſirnamed Callinicus, ſon of Laodice, as his ſucceſſor. After this ridiculous impoſture, it was made public that the king had died a natural death, and Laodice placed her ſon on the throne, and diſpatched Berenice and her ſon, 246 years before the Chriſtian era. Appian.——The third of that name, ſirnamed the Great, brother to Seleucus Ceraunus, was king of Syria and Aſia, and reigned 36 years. He was defeated by Ptolemy Philopater at Raphia, after which he made war againſt Perſia, and took Sardes. After the death of Philopater, he endeavoured to cruſh the infant ſon Euphranes; but his guardians ſolicited the aid of the Romans, and Antiochus was compelled to reſign his pretenſions. He conquered the greateſt part of Greece, of which ſome cities implored the aid of Rome; and Annibal, who had taken refuge at his court, encouraged him to make war againſt Rome. He was glad to find himſelf ſupported by the abilities of ſuch a general; but his meaſures were dilatory, and not agreeable to the advice of Annibal, and he was conquered and obliged to retire beyond mount Taurus, and pay a yearly fine of 2000 talents to the Romans. His revenues being unable to pay the fine, he attempted to plunder the temple of Belus in Suſiana, which ſo incenſed the inhabitants, that they killed him with his followers. 187 years before the Chriſtian era. In his character of king, Antiochus was humane and liberal, the patron of learning, and the friend of merit; and he publiſhed an edict, ordering his ſubjects never to obey except his commands were conſiſtent with the laws of the country. He had three ſons, Seleucus Philopater, Antiochus Epiphanes, and Demetrius. The firſt ſucceeded him, and the two others were kept as hoſtages by the Romans. Juſtin 31 & 32.—Strab. 16.—Liv. 34, c. 59.—Flor. 2, c. 1.—Appian. bell. Syr.——Epiphanes, or Illuſtrious, was king of Syria, after the death of his brother Seleucus, and reigned eleven years. He deſtroyed Jeruſalem, and was ſo cruel to the Jews, that they called him Epimanes, or Furious, and not Epiphanes. He attempted to plunder Perſepolis without effect. He was of a voracious appetite, and fond of childiſh diverſions; he uſed for his pleaſure to empty bags of money in the ſtreets, to ſee the people's eagerneſs to gather it; he bathed in the public baths with the populace, and was fond of perfuming himſelf to exceſs. He invited all the Greeks he could at Antioch, and waited upon them as a ſervant, and danced with ſuch indecency among the ſtage-players, that even the moſt diſſipate and ſhameleſs bluſhed at the ſight. Polybius. Juſtin. 34, c. 3.——The fifth, ſirnamed Eupator, ſucceeded his father Epiphanes on the throne of Syria, 164 B. C. He made a peace with the Jews, and in the ſecond year of his reign was aſſaſſinated by his uncle Demetrius, who ſaid that the crown was lawfully his own, and that it had been ſeized from his father. Juſtin. 34.—Joſeph. 13.——The ſixth, king of Syria, was ſirnamed Entheus, or noble. His father Alexander Bala, entruſted him to the care of Malchus, an Arabian; and he received the crown from Tryphon, in oppoſition to his brother Demetrius, whom the people hated. Before he had been a year on the throne, Tryphon murdered him 143 B. C. and reigned in his place for three years. Joſeph. 13.——The ſeventh, called Sidetes, reigned nine years. In the beginning of his reign, he was afraid of Tryphon, and concealed himſelf, but he ſoon obtained the means of deſtroying his enemy. He made war againſt Phraotes king of Parthia, by whom he was killed in a battle, 130 B. C. He was killed in a war he had undertaken againſt the Parthians. Juſtin. 36, c. 1.—Appian. bell. Syr.——The eighth, ſirnamed Gryphus, from his aquiline noſe, was ſon of Demetrius Nicanor by Cleopatra. His brother Seleucus was deſtroyed by Cleopatra, and he himſelf would have ſhared the ſame fate, had not he diſcovered his mother's artifice, and compelled her to drink the poiſon which was prepared for himſelf. He killed Alexander Zebina, whom Ptolemy had ſent to oppoſe him on the throne of Syria, and was at laſt aſſaſſinated, B. C. 112, after a reign of eleven years. Juſtin. 39, &c.—Joſeph, Appian.——The ninth, ſirnamed Cyzenicus, from the city of Cyzicus, where he received his education, was ſon of Antiochus Sidetes, by Cleopatra. He diſputed the kingdom with his brother Grypus, who ceded to him Cœloſyria, part of his patrimony. He was at laſt conquered by his nephew Seleucus near Antioch, and rather than to continue priſoner in his hands, he killed himſelf, B. C. 93. While a private man, he ſeemed worthy to reign; but when on the throne, he was diſſolute and tyrannical. He was fond of mechanics, and invented ſome uſeful military engines. Appian. Joſeph.——The tenth, was ironically ſirnamed Pius, becauſe he married Selena, the wife of his father and of his uncle. He was the ſon of Antiochus ninth, and he expelled Seleucus the ſon of Grypus from Syria, and was killed in a battle he fought againſt the Parthians, in the cauſe of the Galatians. Joſeph. Appian.——After his death, the kingdom of Syria was torn to pieces by the factions of the royal family or uſurpers, who, under a good or falſe title, under the name of Antiochus or his relations, eſtabliſhed themſelves for a little time either as ſovereigns of Syria, or Damaſcus, or other dependent provinces. At laſt Antiochus, ſirnamed Aſiaticus, the ſon of Antiochus the ninth, was reſtored to his parental throne by the influence of Lucullus the Roman general, on the expulſion of Tigranes king of Armenia from the Syrian dominions; but four years after, Pompey depoſed him, and obſerved, that he who hid himſelf while an uſurper ſat upon his throne, ought not to be a king. From that time, B. C. 65, Syria became a Roman province, and the race of Antiochus was extinguiſhed. Juſtin. 40.——A philoſopher of Aſcalon, famous for his writings, and the reſpect with which he was treated by his pupil Lucullus. He was alſo preceptor to Cicero and Brutus. Plut. in Lucull.——An hiſtorian of Syracuſe, ſon of Xenophanes, who wrote an hiſtory of Sicily, in nine books, in which he began at the age of king Cocalus. Strab.—Diod. 12.——A rich king, tributary to the Romans in the age of Veſpaſian. Tacit. Hiſt. 2, c. 81.——A ſophiſt who refuſed to take upon himſelf the government of a ſtate, on account of the vehemence of his paſſions.——A king conquered by Antony, &c. Cæſ. 3, bell. civ. 4.——A king of Meſſenia. Pauſ. 4.——A commander of the Athenian fleet, under Alcibiades, conquered by Lyſander. *Xenoph. Hiſt. ANTIOPE, daughter of Nycteus king of Thebes, by Polyxo, was beloved by Jupiter, who, to deceive her, changed himſelf into a ſatyr. She became pregnant, and, to avoid the reſentment of her father, ſhe fled to mount Cytheron, where ſhe brought forth twins, Amphion and Zethus. She expoſed them to prevent diſcovery, but they were preſerved. After this ſhe fled to Epopeus, king of Sicyon, who married her. Some ſay that Epopeus carried her away, for which action Nycteus made war againſt him, and at his death left his crown to his brother Lycus, entreating him to continue the war and puniſh the raviſher of his daughter. Lycus obeyed his injunctions, killed Epopeus, and recovered Antiope, whom he loved, and married though his neice. His firſt wife, Dirce, was jealous of his new connection; ſhe prevailed upon her huſband, and Antiope was delivered into her hands, and confined in a priſon, where ſhe was daily tormented. Antiope, after many years of impriſonment, obtained means to eſcape, and went after her ſons, who undertook to avenge her wrongs upon Lycus and his wife Dirce. They took Thebes, put the king to death, and tied Dirce to the tail of a wild bull, who dragged her till ſhe died. Bacchus changed her into a fountain, and deprived Antiope of the uſe of her ſenſes. In this forlorn ſituation ſhe wandered all over Greece, and at laſt found relief from Phocus, ſon of Ornytion, who cured her of her diſorder, and married her. Hyginus, fab. 7, ſays that Antiope was divorced by Lycus, becauſe ſhe had been raviſhed by Epopeus, whom he calls Epaphus, and that after her repudiation, ſhe became pregnant by Jupiter. Mean while Lycus married Dirce, who ſuſpected that her huſband ſtill kept the company of Antiope, upon which ſhe impriſoned her. Antiope however eſcaped from her confinement, and brought forth on mount Cytheron. Some authors have called her daughter of Aſopus, becauſe ſhe was born on the banks of that river. Pauſ. 2, c. 6. l. 9, c. 17.—Ovid. 6 Met. v. 110.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Propert. 3, el. 15.—Homer Od. 11, v. 259.—Hygin. fab. 7, 8, & 155.——A daughter of Theſpius or Theſtius, mother of Alopius by Hercules. Apollod. 2, c. 7.——A daughter of Mars, queen of the Amazons, taken priſoner by Hercules, and given in marriage to Theſeus. ANTIŌRUS, a ſon of Lycurgus. Plut. in Lycurg.

ANTIPĀTER, ſon of Iolaus, was ſoldier under king Philip, and raiſed to the rank of a general under Alexander the Great. When Alexander went to invade Aſia, he left Antipater ſupreme governor of Macedonia, and of all Greece. Antipater exerted himſelf in the cauſe of his king; he made war againſt Sparta, and was ſoon after called into Perſia with a reinforcement by Alexander. He has been ſuſpected of giving poiſon to Alexander, to raiſe himſelf to power.—After Alexander's death, his generals divided the empire among themſelves, and Macedonia was allotted to Antipater. The wars which Greece, and chiefly Athens, had meditated during Alexander's life, now burſt forth with uncommon fury as ſoon as the news of his death was received. The Athenians levied an army of 30,000 men, and equipped 200 ſhips againſt Antipater, who was maſter of Macedonia. Their expedition was attended with much ſucceſs, Antipater was routed in Theſſaly, and even beſieged in the town of Lamia. But when Leoſthenes the Athenian general was mortally wounded under the walls of Lamia, the fortune of the war was changed, Antipater obliged the enemy to raiſe the ſiege, and ſoon after received a reinforcement from Craterus from Aſia, with which he conquered the Athenians at Cranon in Theſſaly. After this defeat, Antipater and Craterus marched into Bœotia, and conquered the Ætolians, and granted peace to the Athenians, on the conditions which Leoſthenes had propoſed to Antipater when beſieged in Lamia, i. e. that he ſhould be abſolute maſter over them. Beſides this, he demanded from their ambaſſadors, Demades, Phocion, and Xenocrates, that they ſhould deliver into his hands the orators Demoſthenes and Hyperides, whoſe eloquence had inflamed the minds of their countrymen, and had been the primary cauſes of the war. The conditions were accepted, a Macedonian garriſon was ſtationed in Athens, but the inhabitants ſtill were permitted the free uſe of their laws and privileges. Antipater and Craterus were the firſt who made hoſtile preparations againſt Perdiccas; and during that time, Polyperchon was appointed over Macedonia. Polyperchon defeated the Ætolians, who had made an invaſion upon Macedonia. Antipater gave aſſiſtance to Eumenes, in Aſia, againſt Antigonus, according to Juſtin 14, c. 2. At his death, B. C. 319. Antipater appointed Polyperchon maſter of all his poſſeſſions; and as he was the oldeſt of all the generals and ſucceſſors of Alexander, he recommended that he might be the ſupreme ruler in their councils, that every thing might be done according to his judgment. As for his ſon Caſſander, he left him in a ſubordinate ſtation under Polyperchon. But Caſſander was of too aſpiring a diſpoſition tamely to obey his father's injunctions. He recovered Macedonia, and made him abſolute. Curt. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 & 10.—Juſtin 11, 12, 13, &c.—Diod. 17, 18, &c.—C. Nep. in Phoc. & Eumen.—*Plut. in Eumen. ANTISTHĔNES, a philoſopher, born of an Athenian father, and of a Phrygian mother. He taught rhetoric, and had among his pupils the famous Diogenes; but when he had heard Socrates, he ſhut up his ſchool, and told his pupils, "Go ſeek for yourſelves a maſter, I have now found one." He was the head of the ſect of the Cynic philoſophers. One of his pupils aſked him, what philoſophy had taught him? "To live with myſelf," ſaid he. He ſold his all, and preſerved only a very ragged coat, which drew the attention of Socrates, and tempted him to ſay to the Cynic, who carried his contempt of dreſs too far, "Antiſthenes, I ſee thy vanity through the holes of thy coat." Antiſthenes taught the unity of God, but he recommended ſuicide. Some of his letters are extant. His doctrines of auſterity were followed as long as he was himſelf an example of the Cynical character, but after his death they were all forgotten. Antiſthenes floriſhed 396 years B. C. Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 35.—Diog. 6.—Plut. in Lyc.——A diſciple of Heraclitus.—An hiſtorian of Rhodes. Diog.

ANTIUM, a maritime town of Italy, built by Aſcanius, or, according to others, by a ſon of Ulyſſes and Circe, upon a promontory 32 miles from Oſtium. It was the capital of the Volſci, who made war againſt the Romans for above 200 years. Camillus took it, and carried all the beaks of their ſhips to Rome, and placed them in the Forum on a tribunal, which from thence was called Roſtrum. This town was dedicated to the goddeſs of Fortune, whoſe ſtatues, when conſulted, gave oracles by a nodding of the head, or other different ſigns. Nero was born there. Cic. de Div. 1.—Horat. 1, od. 35.

ANTOMĔNES, the laſt king of Corinth. After his death, magiſtrates with regal authority were annually choſen.

ANTŌNIA LEX was enacted by M. Antony, the conſul, A. U. C. 708. It abrogated the lex Atia, and renewed the lex Cornelia, by taking away from the people the privilege of chuſing prieſts, and reſtoring it to the college of prieſts, to which it originally belonged. Dio. 44.——Another by the ſame, A. U. C. 703. It ordained that a new decury of judges ſhould be added to the two former, and that they ſhould be choſen from the centurions. Cic. in Philip. 1 & 5.——Another by the ſame. It allowed an appeal to the people, to thoſe who were condemned de majeſtate, or of perfidious meaſures againſt the ſtate.—Another by the ſame, during his triumvirate. It made it a capital offence to propoſe ever after, the election of a dictator, and for any perſon to accept of the office. Appian. de bell. civ. 3.

ANTŌNIA, a daughter of M. Antony, by Octavia. She married Domitius Ænobarbus, and was mother of Nero, and two daughters.—A ſiſter of Germanicus.—A daughter of Claudius and Ælia Petina. She was of the family of the Tubero's, and was repudiated for her levity. Sueton. in Claud. 1.—Tacit. Ann. 11.——The wife of Druſus, the ſon of Livia, and brother of Tiberius. She became mother of three children, Germanicus, Caligula's father; Claudius the emperor, and the debauched Livia. Her huſband died very early, and ſhe never would marry again, but ſpent her time in the education of her children. Some people ſuppoſe her grandſon Caligula ordered her to be poiſoned, A. D. 38. Val. Max. 4, c. 3.——A caſtle of Jeruſalem, which received this name in honor of M. Antony.

ANTŌNII, a patrician and plebeian family, which are ſaid to derive their origin from Antones, a ſon of Hercules, as Plut. in Anton. informs us.

ANTONĪNA, the wife of Beliſarius, &c.

ANTONĪNUS, ſirnamed Pius, was adopted by the emperor Adrian, to whom he ſucceeded. This prince is remarkable for all the virtues that can form a perfect ſtateſman, philoſopher, and king. He rebuilt whatever cities had been deſtroyed by wars in former reigns. In caſes of famine or inundation, he relieved the diſtreſſed, and ſupplied their wants with his own money. He ſuffered the governors of the provinces to remain long in the adminiſtration, that no opportunity of extortion might be given to new comers. In his behaviour to his ſubjects, he behaved with affability and humanity, and liſtened with patience to every complaint brought before him. When told of conquering heroes, he ſaid with Scipio, I prefer the life and preſervation of a citizen, to the death of 100 enemies. He did not perſecute the Chriſtians like his predeceſſors, but his life was a ſcene of univerſal benevolence. His laſt moments were eaſy, though preceded by a lingering illneſs. When conſul of Aſia, he lodged at Smyrna in the houſe of a ſophiſt, who in civility obliged the governor to change his houſe at night. The ſophiſt, when Antoninus became emperor, viſited Rome, and was jocoſely deſired to uſe the palace as his own houſe, without any apprehenſion of being turned out at night. He extended the boundaries of the Roman province in Britain, by raiſing a rampart between the friths of Clyde and Forth; but he waged no wars during his reign, and only repulſed the enemies of the empire who appeared in the field. He died in the 75th year of his age, after a reign of 23 years, A. D. 161. He was ſucceeded by his adopted ſon M. Aurelius Antoninus, ſirnamed the philoſopher, a prince as virtuous as his father. He raiſed to the imperial dignity his brother L. Verus, whoſe voluptuouſneſs and diſſipation were as conſpicuous as the moderation of the philoſopher. During their reign, the Quadi, Parthians, and Marcomanni were defeated. Antoninus wrote a book in Greek, intitled τα καθ' ἑαυτον, concerning himſelf. The beſt editions of which are the 4to Cantab. 1652, and the 8vo. Oxon. 1704. After the war with the Quadi had been finiſhed, Verus died of an apoplexy, and Antoninus ſurvived him eight years, and died in his 61ſt year, after a reign of 19 years and ten days. Dio. Caſſius.——Baſſiānus Caracalla, was ſon of the emperor Septimus Severus, celebrated for his cruelties. He killed his brother Geta in his mother's arms, and attempted to deſtroy the writings of Ariſtotle, obſerving that Ariſtotle was one of thoſe who ſent poiſon to Alexander. He married his mother, and publicly lived with her, which gave occaſion to the people of Alexandria to ſay that he was an Œdipus and his wife a Jocaſta. This joke was fatal to them; and the emperor, to puniſh their ill language, ſlaughtered many thouſands in Alexandria. After aſſuming the name and dreſs of Achilles, and ſtiling himſelf the conqueror of provinces he had never ſeen, he was aſſaſſinated at Edeſſa by Macrinus, April 8, in the 43d year of his age, A. D. 217. His body was ſent to his wife Julia, who ſtabbed herſelf at the ſight.——There is extant a Greek itinerary, and another book called Iter Britannicum, which ſome have attributed to the emperor Antoninus, though it was written by a perſon of that name whoſe age is unknown.

ANTONIOPŌLIS, a city of Meſopotamia. Marcell. 8.

M. AN-

M. Antonius Gnipho, a poet of Gaul who taught rhetoric at Rome; Cicero and other illuſtrious men frequented his ſchool. He never aſked any thing for his lectures, whence he received more from the liberality of his pupils. Sueton. de Illuſt. Gr. 7.——An orator, grandfather to the triumvir of the ſame name. He was killed in the civil wars of Marius. His head was hung in the Forum. Val. Max. 9, c. 2.—Lucan. 2, v. 121,——Marcus, the eldeſt ſon of the orator of the ſame name; who, by means of Cotta and Cethegus, obtained from the ſenate the office of managing the corn on the maritime coaſts of the Mediterranean with unlimited power. This gave him many opportunities of plundering the provinces and enriching himſelf. He died of a broken heart. Salluſt. Frag.——Caius, a ſon of the orator of that name. He obtained a troop of horſe from Sylla, and plundered Achaia. He was carried before the pretor M. Lucullus, and baniſhed from the ſenate by the cenſors, for pillaging the allies, and refuſing to appear when ſummoned before juſtice.——Caius, ſon of Antonius Caius, was conſul with Cicero, aſſiſted him to deſtroy the conſpiracy of Catiline in Gaul. He went to Macedonia, as his province, and fought with ill ſucceſs againſt the Dardani. He was accuſed at his return, and baniſhed.——Marcus, the triumvir, was grandſon to the orator M. Antonius, and ſon of Antonius, ſirnamed Cretenſis, from his wars in Crete. He was augur and tribune of the people, in which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ambitious views. He always entertained a ſecret reſentment againſt Cicero, which aroſe from Cicero's having put to death Corn. Lentulus, who was concerned in Catiline's conſpiracy. This Lentulus had married Antonius's mother after his father's death. When the ſenate was torn by the factions of Pompey's and Cæſar's adherents, Antony propoſed that both ſhould lay aſide the command of their armies in the provinces; but as this propoſition met not with ſucceſs, he privately retired from Rome to the camp of Cæſar, adviſed him to march his army to Rome, and, in ſupport of his attachment, commanded the left wing of his army at Pharſalia, and according to a premeditated ſcheme, offered him a diadem in the preſence of the Roman people. When Cæſar was aſſaſſinated in the ſenate houſe, his friend Antony ſpoke an oration over his body, and to ingratiate himſelf and his party with the populace, he reminded them of the liberal treatment they had received from Cæſar. He beſieged Mutina, which had been allotted to D. Brutus, for which the ſenate judged him an enemy to the republic, at the remonſtration of Cicero. He was conquered by the conſuls Hirtus and Panſa, and by young Cæſar, who ſoon after joined his intereſt with that of Antony, and formed the celebrated triumvirate, which was eſtabliſhed with ſuch cruel proſcriptions that Antony did not even ſpare his own uncle that he might ſtrike off the head of his enemy Cicero. The triumvirate divided the Roman empire among themſelves; Lepidus was ſet over all Italy, Auguſtus the weſt, and Antony returned into the eaſt, where he enlarged his dominions by different conqueſts. Antony had married Fulvia, whom he repudiated to marry Octavia the ſiſter of Auguſtus, and by this connection to ſtrengthen the triumvirate. He aſſiſted Auguſtus at the battle of Philippi againſt the murderers of J. Cæſar, and he buried the body of M. Brutus, his enemy, in a moſt magnificent manner. During his reſidence in the eaſt, he became enamoured of the fair Cleopatra queen of Egypt, and repudiated Octavia to marry her. This divorce incenſed Auguſtus, who now prepared to deprive Antony of all his power. Antony aſſembled all the forces of the eaſt, and with Cleopatra marched againſt Octavius Cæſar. Theſe two enemies met at Actium, where a naval engagement ſoon began, and Cleopatra, by flying with 60 ſails, drew Antony from the battle, and ruined his cauſe. After the battle of Actium, Antony followed Cleopatra into Egypt, where he was ſoon informed of the defection of all his allies and adherents, and ſaw the conqueror on his ſhores. He ſtabbed himſelf, and Cleopatra likewiſe killed herſelf with the bite of an aſp. Antony died in the 56th year of his age, B. C. 30, and the conqueror ſhed tears when he was informed that his enemy was no more. Antony left ſeven children by his three wives. He has been blamed for his great effeminacy, for his uncommon love of pleaſures, and his fondneſs of drinking. It is ſaid that he wrote a book in praiſe of drunkenneſs. He was fond of imitating Hercules, from whom, according to ſome accounts, he was deſcended; and he is often repreſented as Hercules, with Cleopatra in the form of Omphale, dreſſed in the arms of her ſubmiſſive lover, and beating him with her ſandals. In his public character, Antony was brave and courageous, but with the intrepidity of Cæſar, he poſſeſſed all his voluptuous inclinations. He was prodigal to a degree, and did not ſcruple to call, from vanity, his ſons by Cleopatra, kings of kings. His fondneſs for low company, and his debauchery, form the beſt parts of Cicero's Philippics. It is ſaid, that the night of Cæſar's murder, Caſſius ſupped with Antony; and being aſked whether he had a dagger with him, anſwered, yes, if you, Antony, aſpire to ſovereign power. Plutarch has written an account of his life. *Virg. Aparni, a nation of ſhepherds near the Caſpian ſea. Strab.

Apatūria, a feſtival at Athens which received its name from απατη, deceit, becauſe it was inſtituted in memory of a ſtratagem by which Xanthus king of Bœotia was killed by Melanthus king of Athens, upon the following occaſion: when a war aroſe between the Bœotians and Athenians about a piece of ground which divided their territories, Xanthus made a propoſal to the Athenian king to decide the battle by ſingle combat.

ombat. Thymœtes, who was then on the hrone of Athens, refuſed, and his ſucceſſor Melanthus accepted the challenge. When hey began the engagement, Melanthus exlaimed, that his antagoniſt had ſome perſon ehind him to ſupport him; upon which Xanthus looked behind, and was killed by Melanthus. From this ſucceſs, Jupiter was alled απατηνωρ deceiver, and Bacchus, who as ſuppoſed to be behind Xanthus, was alled Μελανιγις, clothed in the ſkin of black goat. Some derive the word from πατορια, i. e. ομοτορια, becauſe on the day f the feſtival, the children accompanied heir fathers to be regiſtered among the itizens. The feſtival laſted three days, the rſt day was called δορπια, becauſe ſuppers ρποι were prepared for each ſeparate tribe. he ſecond day was called αναρρυσι απο ου ανω ερυειν, becauſe ſacrifices were offered Jupiter and Minerva, and the head of he victims was generally turned up towards he heavens. The third was called Κουρεωτις, om κουρος a youth, or κουρα ſhaving, beauſe the young men had their hair cut off efore they were regiſtered, when their arents ſwore that they were free-born Aenians. They generally ſacrificed two wes and a ſhe-goat to Diana. This feſtival as adopted by the Ionians, except the inabitants of Epheſus and Colophon.——A name of Minerva——of Venus.

Apeauros, a mountain in Peloponneſus. olyb. 4.

Apella, a word, Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 10, hich has given much trouble to critics and mmentators. Some ſuppoſe it to mean rcumſcribed, an epithet highly applicable a Jew. Others maintain that it is a prer name, upon the authority of Cicero ad tic. 12, ep. 19, who mentions a perſon of e ſame name.

Apelles, a celebrated painter of Cos, , as others ſay, of Epheſus ſon of Pithius. e lived in the age of Alexander the great, ho honored him ſo much that he forbade y man but Apelles to draw his picture. He as ſo attentive to his profeſſion, that he ver ſpent a day without employing his ncil, whence the proverb of Nulla dies e lineâ. His moſt perfect picture was enus Anadyomene, which was not totally iſhed when the painter died. He made ainting of Alexander holding thunder in hand, ſo much like life, that Pliny, who w it, ſays that the hand of the king with e thunder ſeemed to come out of the picre. This picture was placed in Diana's mple at Epheſus. He made another of exander, but the king expreſſed not ch ſatisfaction at the ſight of it; and at t moment a horſe paſſing by, neighed at e horſe which was repreſented in the piece, ſuppoſing it to be alive; upon which the painter ſaid, "one would imagine that the horſe is a better judge of painting that your majeſty." When Alexander ordered him to draw the picture of Campaſpe, one of his miſtreſſes, Apelles became enamoured of her, and the king permitted him to marry her. He wrote three volumes upon painting, which were ſtill extant in the age of Pliny. It is ſaid that he was accuſed in Egypt of conſpiring againſt the life of Ptolemy, and that he would have been put to death had not the real conſpirator diſcovered himſelf, and ſaved the painter. Apelles never put his name to any pictures but three; a ſleeping Venus, Venus Anadyomene, and an Alexander. The proverb of Ne ſutor ultra crepidam, is applied to him by ſome. Plin. 35, c. 10.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 238.—Cic. in Famil. 1, ep. 9.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 3, v. 401.—Val. Max. 8, c. 11.———A Macedonian general, &c.

Apellicon, a Teian Peripatetic philoſopher, whoſe fondneſs for books was ſo great that he is accuſed of ſtealing them, when he could not obtain them with money. He bought the works of Ariſtotle and Theophraſtus, but greatly diſfigured them by his frequent interpolations. The extenſive library which he had collected at Athens, was carried to Rome when Sylla had conquered the capital of Attica, and among the valuable books was found an original manuſcript of Ariſtotle. He died about 86 years before Chriſt. Strab. 13.

Apis, one of the ancient kings of Peloponneſus, ſon of Phoroneus and Laodice. Some ſay that Apollo was his father, and that he was king of Argos, while others called him king of Sicyon, and fix the time of his reign above 200 years earlier, which is enough to ſhew he is but obſcurely known, if known at all. He was a native of Naupactum, and deſcended from Inachus. He received divine honors after death, as he had been munificent and humane to his ſubjects. The country where he reigned was called Apia; afterwards it received the name of Pelaſgia, Argia, or Argolis, and at laſt that of Peloponneſus, from Pelops. Some, amongſt whom is Varro, and St. Auguſtine, have imagined that Apis went to Egypt with a colony of Greeks, and that he civilized the inhabitants, inhabitants, and polished their manners, for which they made him a god after death, and paid divine honors to him under the name of Serapis. This tradition, according to some of the moderns, is without foundation. Æschyl. in Suppl.—August. de Civ. Dei. 18, c. 5.—Paus. 2, c. 5.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—— A son of Jason, born in Arcadia; he was killed by the horses of Ætolus. Paus. 5, c. 1.——A town of Egypt, on the lake Marcotis.——A god of the Egyptians, worshipped under the form of an ox. Some say that Isis and Osiris are the deities worshipped under this name, because during their reign they taught the Egyptians agriculture. The Egyptians believed that the soul of Osiris was really departed into the ox, where it wished to dwell, because that animal had been of the most essential service in the cultivation of the ground, which Osiris had introduced into Egypt. The ox that was chosen, was always distinguished by particular marks: his body was black; he had a square white spot upon the forehead, the figure of an eagle upon the back, a knot under the tongue like a beetle, the hairs of his tail were double, and his right side was marked with a whitish spot, resembling the crescent of the moon. Without these, an ox could not be taken as the god Apis; and it is to be imagined that the priests gave these distinguishing characteristics to the animal, on which their credit and even prosperity depended, The festival of Apis lasted seven days; the ox was led in a solemn procession by the priests, and every one was anxious to receive him into his house, and it was believed that the children who smelt his breath received the knowledge of futurity. The ox was conducted to the banks of the Nile with much ceremony, and if he had lived to the time which their sacred books allowed, they drowned him in the river, and embalmed his body, and buried it in solemn state in the city of Memphis. After his death, which sometimes was natural, the greatest cries and lamentations were heard in Egypt, as if Osiris was just dead; the priests shaved their heads, which was a sign of the deepest mourning. This continued till another ox appeared with the proper characteristics to succeed as the deity, which was followed with the greatest acclamations as if Osiris was returned to life. This ox, which was found to represent Apis, was left 40 days in the city of the Nile before he was carried to Memphis, during which time none but women were permitted to appear before him, and this they performed according to their superstitious notions, in a wanton and indecent manner. There was also an ox worshipped at Heliopolis, under the name of Mnevis; some suppose that he was Osiris, but others maintain that the Apis of Memphis was sacred to Osiris, and Mnevis to Isis. When Cambyses came into Egypt, the people were celebrating the festivals of Apis with every mark of joy and triumph, which the conqueror interpreted as an insult upon himself. He called the priests of Apis, and ordered the deity itself to come before him. When he saw that an ox was the object of their veneration, and the cause of such rejoicings, he wounded it on the thigh, ordered the priests to be chastised, and commanded his soldiers to slaughter such as were found celebrating such riotous festivals. The god Apis had generally two stables, or rather temples. If he eat from the hand, it was a favorable omen; but if he refused the food that was offered him, it was interpreted as unlucky. From this, Germanicus, when he visited Egypt, drew the omens of his approaching death. When his oracle was consulted, incense was burnt on an altar, and a piece of money placed upon it, after which the people that wished to know futurity, applied their ear to the mouth of the God, and immediately retired, stopping their ears till they had departed from the temple. The first sounds that were heard, were taken as the answer of the oracle to their questions. Paus. 7, c. 22.—Herodot. 2 & 3.—Plin. 8, c. 38, &c.—Strab. 7. Plut. in Isid. & Osir.—Apollod. 1, c. 7. l. 2, c. 1.—Mela. 1, c. 9.—Plin. 8, c. 39, &c.—Strab. 7.—*Ælian V. APITIUS GALBA, a celebrated buffoon in the time of Tiberius. Juv. 5, v. 4.

APOLLINARES LUDI, games celebrated at Rome in honor of Apollo. They originated from the following circumstance: an old prophetic poem informed the Romans that if they instituted yearly games to Apollo, and made a collection of money for his service, they would be able to repel the enemy whose approach already signified their destruction. The first time they were celebrated, Rome was alarmed by the approach of the enemy, and instantly the people rushed out of the city, and saw a cloud of arrows discharged from the sky on the troops of the enemy. With this heavenly assistance they easily obtained the victory. The people generally sat crowned with laurel at the representation of these games, which were usually celebrated at the option of the pretor, till the year U. C. 545, when a law was passed to settle the celebration yearly on the same day about the nones of July. When this alteration happened, Rome was infested with a dreadful pestilence, which however seemed, ed to be appeaſed by this act of religion. Liv. 25, c. 12.

APOLLINARIS, C. Sulpitius, a grammarian of Carthage, in the ſecond century, who is ſuppoſed to be the author of the verſes prefixed to Terence's plays as argument.

APOLLO, ſon of Jupiter and Latona, called alſo Phœbus, is often confounded with the Sun. According to Cicero, 3 de Nat. Deor. there were four perſons of this name. The firſt was ſon of Vulcan, and the tutelary god of the Athenians. The ſecond was ſon of Corybas, and was born in Crete, for the dominion of which he diſputed even with Jupiter himſelf. The third was ſon of Jupiter and Latona, and came from the nations of the Hyperboreans to Delphi. The fourth was born in Arcadia, and called Nomion, becauſe he gave laws to the inhabitants. To the ſon of Jupiter and Latona all the actions of the others ſeem to have been attributed. The Apollo, ſon of Vulcan, was the ſame as the Orus of the Egyptians, and was the moſt ancient, from whom the actions of the others have been copied. The three others ſeem to be of Grecian origin. The tradition that the ſon of Latona was born in the floating iſland of Delos, is taken from the Egyptian mythology, which aſſerts that the ſon of Vulcan, which is ſuppoſed to be Orus, was ſaved by his mother Iſis from the perſecution of Typhon, and entruſted to the care of Latona, who concealed him in the iſland of Chemmis.——When Latona was pregnant by Jupiter, Juno, who was ever jealous of her huſband's amours, raiſed the ſerpent Python to torment Latona, who was refuſed a place to give birth to her children, till Neptune, moved at the ſeverity of her fate, raiſed the iſland of Delos from the bottom of the ſea, where Latona brought forth Apollo and Diana. Apollo was the god of all the fine arts, of medicine, muſic, poetry, and eloquence, of all which he was deemed the inventor. He had received from Jupiter the power of knowing futurity, and he was the only one of the gods whoſe oracles were in general repute over the world. His amours with Leucothoe, Daphne, Iſſa, Bolina, Coronis, Clymene, Cyrene, Chione, Acacallis, Calliope, &c. are well known, and the various ſhapes he aſſumed to gratify his paſſion. He was very fond of young Hyacynthus, whom he accidentally killed with a quoit; as alſo of Cypariſſus, who was changed into a cypreſs tree. When his ſon Æſculapius had been killed with the thunders of Jupiter, for raiſing the dead to life, Apollo, in his reſentment, killed the Cyclops who had fabricated the thunderbolts. Jupiter was incenſed at this act of violence, and he baniſhed Apollo from heaven, and deprived him of his dignity. The exiled deity came to Admetus king of Theſſaly, and hired himſelf to be one of his ſhepherds, in which ignoble employment he remained nine years; from which circumſtance he was called the god of ſhepherds, and at his ſacrifices a wolf was generally offered, as that animal is the declared enemy of the ſheepfold. During his reſidence in Theſſaly, he rewarded the tender treatment of Admetus. He gave him a chariot, drawn by a lion and a bull, with which he was able to obtain in marriage Alceſte the daughter of Pelias; and ſoon after, the Parcæ granted, at Apollo's requeſt, that Admetus might be redeemed from death, if another perſon laid down his life for him.—He aſſiſted Neptune in building the walls of Troy; and when he was refuſed the promiſed reward from Laomedon, the king of the country, he deſtroyed the inhabitants by a peſtilence.—As ſoon as he was born, Apollo deſtroyed, with arrows, the ſerpent Python, whom Juno had ſent to perſecute Latona; hence he was called Pythius. He was not the inventor of the lyre, as ſome have imagined, but Mercury gave it him, and received as a reward the famous caduceus with which Apollo was wont to drive the flocks of Admetus. His conteſt with Pan and Marſyas, and the puniſhment inflicted upon Midas, are well known. He received the ſirnames of Phœbus, Delius, Cynthius, Pæan, Delphicus, Nomius, Lycius, Clarius, Iſmenius, Vulturius, Smintheus, &c. for reaſons which are explained under thoſe words. Apollo is generally repreſented with long hair, and the Romans were fond of imitating his figure, and therefore in their youth they were remarkable for their fine head of hair, which they cut ſhort at the age of 17 or 18. He is always repreſented as a tall beardleſs young man with a handſome ſhape, holding in his hand a bow, and ſometimes a lyre; his head is generally ſurrounded with beams of light. He was the deity who, according to the notions of the ancients, inflicted plagues, and in that moment he appeared ſurrounded with clouds. His worſhip and power were univerſally acknowledged: he had temples and ſtatues in every country, particularly in Egypt, Greece, and Italy. His ſtatue, which ſtood upon mount Actium, as a mark to mariners to avoid the dangerous coaſts, was particularly famous, and it appeared at a great reat diſtance on the ſea. Auguſtus, before the battle of Actium, addreſſed himſelf to it for victory. The cock, the graſshopper, the wolf, the crow, the ſwan, the hawk, the olive, the laurel, the palm-tree, &c. were acred to him; and in his ſacrifices, wolves nd hawks were offered, as they were the atural enemies of the flocks over which he reſided. Bullocks and lambs were alſo mmolated to him. As he preſided over oetry, he was often ſeen on mount Parnaſus with the nine Muſes. His moſt famous racles were at Delphi, Delos, Claros, Tenedos, Cyrrha and Patara. His moſt ſplenid temple was at Delphi, where every naion and individual made conſiderable preents when they conſulted the oracle. Auguſtus, after the battle of Actium, built him temple on mount Palatine, which he enriched with a valuable library. He had a amous Coloſſus in Rhodes, which was one f the ſeven wonders of the world. Apollo as been taken for the Sun; but it may be roved by different paſſages in the ancient riters, that Apollo, the Sun, Phœbus, and Hyperion, were all different characters and eities, though confounded together. When nce Apollo was addreſſed as the Sun, and repreſented with a crown of rays on his ead, the idea was adopted by every writer, nd from thence aroſe the miſtake. *Ovid. He was pupil, when young, to Callimachus and Panætius. He was the third librarian of the famous library of Alexandria, under Ptolemy Evergetes. He was ungrateful to his maſter Callimachus, who wrote a poem againſt him, in which he denominated him Ibis. Of all his works nothing remains but his poem on the expedition of the Argonauts, in four books. The beſt editions of Apollonius, are thoſe printed at Oxford, in 4to, by Shaw, 1777, in 2 vols. and in 1, 8vo, 1779, and that of Brunck Argentor. 12mo, 1780. Quintil. 10, c. 1.——A Greek orator ſirnamed Molo. He was a native of Alabanda in Caria. He opened a ſchool of rhetoric at Rhodes and Rome, and had J. Cæſar and Cicero among his pupils. He wrote an hiſtory, in which he did not candidly treat the people of Judæa, according to the complaint of Joſephus contra Apion. Cic. de orat. 1, c. 75, 126 & 130. Ad. famil. 3, ep. 16. De Invent. 1, c. 81.—Quintil. 3, c. 1. l. 12, c. 6.—Suet. in Cæſ. 4.—Plut. in Cæſ.——A Greek hiſtorian about the age of Auguſtus, who wrote upon the philoſophy of Zeno, and of his followers. Strab. 14.——A Stoic philoſopher who attended Cato of Utica in his laſt moments. Plut. in Cat.——An officer ſet over Egypt by Alexander. Curt. 4, c. 8.——A wreſtler. Pauſ. 5.——A phyſician of Pergamus, who wrote on agriculture. Varro.——A grammarian of Alexandria.——A writer in the age of Antoninus Pius.——Thyaneus, a Pythagorean philoſopher, well ſkilled in the ſecret arts of magic. Being one day haranguing the populace at Epheſus, he ſuddenly exclaimed, "Strike the tyrant, ſtrike him; the blow is given, he is wounded, and fallen!" At that very moment the emperor Domitian had been ſtabbed at Rome. The magician acquired much reputation when this circumſtance was known. He was courted by kings and princes, and commanded unuſual attention by his matchleſs artifices. His friend and companion, called Damis, wrote his life, which 200 years after engaged the attention of Philoſtratus. In his hiſtory the biographer relates ſo many curious and extraordinary anecdotes of his hero, that many have juſtly deemed it a romance; yet for all this, Hierocles had the preſumption to compare the impoſtures of Apollonius with the miracles of Jeſus Chriſt.——A ſophiſt of Alexandria, diſtinguiſhed for his Lexicon Græcum Iliadis et Odyſſeæ, a book that was beautifully edited by Villoiſon in 4to. 2 vols. Paris, 1773. Apollonius was one of the pupils of Didymus, and floriſhed in the beginning of the firſt century.——A phyſician.——A ſon of Sotades at the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus.——Syrus, a Platonic philoſopher.——Herophilius, wrote concerning ointments.

APOLLŌPHĂNES, a Stoic, who greatly flattered king Antigonus, and maintained that there exiſted but one virtue, prudence. Diog.——A phyſician in the court of Antiochus. Polyb. 5.——A comic poet. Ælian. Anim. 6.

APOMYĪOS, a ſirname of Jupiter.

APONIANA, an iſland near Lilybæum. Hirt. Afric. 2.

M. APONIUS, a governor of Mœſia, rewarded with a triumphal ſtatue by Otho, for defeating 9000 barbarians. Tacit. Hiſt. 1, c. 79.

APONUS, a fountain with a village of the ſame name near Patavium in Italy. The waters of the fountain were wholeſome, and were ſuppoſed to have an oracular power. Lucan. 7, v. 194.—Suet. in Tiber. 14.

APOSTROPHIA, a ſirname of Venus in Bœotia, who was diſtinguiſhed under three names, Venus Urania, Vulgaria, and Apoſtrophia. The former was the patroneſs of a pure and chaſte love; the ſecond of carnal and ſenſual deſires; and the laſt incited men to illicit and unnatural gratifications, to inceſts and rapes. Venus Apoſtrophia was invoked by the Thebans, that they might be ſaved from ſuch unlawful deſires. She is the ſame as the Verticordia of the Romans. Pauſ. 9, c. 16.——Val. Max. 8, c. 15.

APOTHĔŌSIS, a ceremony obſerved by the ancient nations of the world, by which they raiſed their kings, heroes, and great men, to the rank of deities. The nations of the eaſt were the firſt who paid divine honors to their great men, and the Romans followed their example, and not only deified the moſt prudent and humane of their emperors, but alſo the moſt cruel and profligate. Herodian has left us an account of the apotheoſis of a Roman emperor. After the body of the deceaſed was burnt, an ivory image was laid on a couch for seven days, representing the emperor under the agonies of disease. The city was in sorrow, the senate visited it in mourning, and the physicians pronounced it every day in a more decaying state. When the death was announced, a young band of senators carried the couch and image to the Campus Martius, where it was deposited on an edifice in the form of a pyramid, where spices and combustible materials were thrown. After this the knights walked round the pile in solemn procession, and the images of the most illustrius Romans were drawn in state, and immediately the new emperor, with a torch, set fire to the pile, and was assisted by the surrounding multitude. Mean while an eagle was let fly from the middle of the pile, which was supposed to carry the soul of the deceased to heaven, where he was ranked among the gods. If the deified was a female, a peacock, and not an eagle, was sent from the flames.—The Greeks observed ceremonies much of the same nature.

Appia via, a celebrated road leading from Rome to Brundusium, through Capua. Appius Claudius made it as far as Capua, and it received its name from him. It was continued and finished by Gracchus, J. Cæsar, and Augustus. Lucan. 3, v. 285.—Stat. 2. Sylv. 2, v. 12.—Mart. 9, ep. 104.

Appiădes, a name given to these five deities, Venus, Pallas, Vesta, Concord, and Peace. A temple was erected to them near the Appiæ Aquæ, by the forum of J. Cæsar. Ovid. de Art. Am. 3, v. 452.

Appiānus, a Greek historian of Alexandria, who flourished A. D. 123. His universal history, which consisted of 24 books, was a series of history of all the nations that had been conquered by the Romans in the order of time; and in the composition, the writer displayed, with a style simple and unadorned, a great knowledge of military affairs, and described his battles in a masterly manner. This excellent history is greatly mutilated, and there is extant now only the account of the Punic, Syrian, Parthian, Mithridatic, and Spanish wars, with those of Illyricum and the civil dissentions, with a fragment of the Celtic wars. The best editions are those of Tollius and Variorum, 2 vols. 8vo, Amst. 1670, and that of Schweigheuserus, 3 vols. 8vo. Lipsi. 1785. He was so eloquent that the emperor highly promoted him in the state. He wrote an universal history in 24 books, which begins from the time of the Trojan war, down to his own age. Few books of this valuable work are extant.

Appii forum, a little village not far from Rome, built by the consul Appius. Horat. 1, sat. 5.

Appius, the prænomen of an illustrious family at Rome.——A censor of that name, A. U. C. 442. Orat. 1, sat. 6.

Appius Claudius, a decemvir who obtained his power by force and oppression. He attempted the virtue of Virginia, whom her father killed to preserve her chastity. This act of violence was the cause of a revolution in the state, and the ravisher was banished. Liv. 3, c. 33.——Claudius Cæcus, a Roman orator, who built the Appian way, and many aqueducts in Rome. When Pyrrhus, who was come to assist the Tarentines against Rome, demanded peace of the senators, Appius caused himself to be carried to the senate-house, and, by his authority, dissuaded them from granting a peace which would prove dishonourable to the Roman name. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 203.—Cic. in Brut. & Tusc. 4.——A Roman, who, when he heard that he had been proscribed by the triumvirs, divided his riches among his servants, and embarked with them for Sicily. In their passage the vessel was shipwrecked, and Appius alone saved his life. Appian. 4.——Claudius Crassus, a consul, who, with Sp. Naut. Rutulus, conquered the Celtiberians, and was defeated by Perseus king of Macedonia. Liv.——Claudius Pulcher, a grandson of Ap. Cl. Cæcus, consul in the age of Sylla, retired from grandeur to enjoy the pleasures of a private life.——Clausus, a general of the Sabines, who, upon being ill treated by his countrymen, retired to Rome with 5000 of his friends, and was admitted into the senate in the early ages of the republic. Plut. in Poplic.——Herdonius seized the Capitol with 4,000 exiles, A. U. C. 292, and was soon after overthrown. Liv. 3, c. 15.—Flor. 3, c. 19——Claudius Lentulus, a consul with M. Perpenna.—A dictator who conquered the Hernici.—The name of Appius was common in Rome, and particularly to many consuls whose history is not marked by any uncommon event.

Appŭla, an immodest woman, &c. Juv. 6, v. 64.

Apries & Aprius, one of the kings of Egypt in the age of Cyrus, supposed to be the Pharaoh Hophra of scripture; he took Sidon, and lived in great prosperity till his subjects revolted to Amasis, by whom he was conquered and strangled. Herodot. 2, c. 159, &c.—Diod. 1.

Apsinthii, a people of Thrace; they received their name from a river called Apsinthus, which flowed through their territory. Dionys. Perieg.

Apsinus, an Athenian sophist in the 3d century, author of a work called Præceptor de arte rhetorica.

Apsus, a river of Macedonia falling into the Ionian sea between Dyrrhachium and Apollonia. Lucan. 5, v. 461.

Aptĕra,

Aptĕra, an inland town of Crete. Ptol.

Apulĕia lex, was enacted by L. Apuleius the tribune, A. U. C. 652, for inflicting a punishment upon such as were guilty of raising seditions, or shewing violence in the city.——Varilia, a grand-daughter of Augustus, condemned of adultery with a certain Manlius, in the reign of Tiberius. Tacit. An. c. 50.

Apulĕius, a learned man who studied at Carthage, Athens, and Rome, where he married a rich widow called Pudatilla, for which he was accused by some of her relations of using magical arts to win her heart. His apology was a masterly composition. In his youth, Apuleius had been very expensive; but he was, in a maturer age, more devoted to study, and learnt Latin without a master. The most famous of his works extant is the golden ass, in eleven books, an allegorical piece replete with morality. The best editions of Apuleius are the Delphin, 2 vols. 4to. Paris, 1688, and Prittæi, 8vo. Goudæ, 1650.

Apŭlia, a country of Italy between Daunia and Calabria. It was part of the ancient Magna Græcia, and generally divided into Apulia Daunia, and Apulia Peucetia. It was famous for its wools. Some suppose that it is called after Apulus, an ancient king of the country before the Trojan war. Plin. 3, c. 11.—Cic. de Div. 1, c. 43.—Strab. 6.—Mela. 2.—Martial in Apoph. 155.

Apuscidāmus, a lake of Africa. All bodies, however heavy, were said to swim on the surface of its waters. Plin. 32, c. 2.

Aquarius, one of the signs of the Zodiac, rising in January, and setting in February. Some suppose that Ganymede was changed into this sign. Virg. G. 3, v. 304.

Aquilaria, a place of Africa. Cæs. 2, bell. civ. 23.

Aquilēia and Aquilēgia, a town founded by a Roman colony, called, from its grandeur, Roma secunda, and situated at the north of the Adriatic sea, on the confines of Italy. The Romans built it chiefly to oppose the frequent incursions of the barbarians. The Roman emperors enlarged and beautified it, and often made it their residence. Ital. 8, v. 605.—Martial. 4, ep. 25.—Mela. 2, c. 4.

Aquilius Niger, an historian mentioned by Sueton. in Aug. 11.——Marcus, a Roman consul who had the government of Asia Minor. Justin. 36, c. 4.——Sabinus, a lawyer of Rome, surnamed the Cato of his age. He was father to Aquilia Severa, whom Heliogabalus married.——Severus, a poet and historian in the age of Valentinian.

Aquillia & Aquilia, a patrician family at Rome, from which few illustrious men rose.

Aquĭlo, a wind blowing from the north. Its name is derived, according to some, from Aquila, on account of its keenness and velocity.

Aquilonia, a city of the Hirpini in Italy. Liv. 10, c. 38.

Aquinius, a poet of a moderate capacity. Cic. 5. Tusc.

Aquīnum, a town of Latium, on the borders of the Samnites, where Juvenal was born. Strab.—Ital. 8, v. 404.—Juv. 3, v. 319.

Aquitania, a country of Gaul, bounded on the west by Spain, north by the province of Lugdunum, south by the province called Gallia Narbonensis. Its inhabitants are called Aquitani. Plin. 4, c. 17.—Strab. 4.

Ara, a constellation, consisting of seven stars, near the tail of the scorpion. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 138.

Ara lugdunensis, a place at the confluence of the Arar and Rhone. Juv. 1, v. 44.

Arabarches, a vulgar person among the Egyptians, or perhaps an usual expression for the leaders of the Arabians, who resided in Rome. Juv. 1, v. 130. Some believe that Cicero, 2 ep. 17 ad Attic. alluded to Pompey under the name of Arabarches.

Arăbia, a large country of Asia, forming a peninsula between the Arabian and Persian gulfs. It is generally divided into three different parts, Petræa, Deserta, and Felix. It is famous for its frankincense and aromatic plants. The inhabitants were formerly under their own chiefs, an uncivilized people, who paid adoration to the sun, moon, and even serpents, and who had their wives in common, and circumcised their children. The country has often been invaded, but never totally subdued. Alexander the great expressed his wish to place the seat of his empire in their territories. The soil is rocky and sandy, the inhabitants are scarce, the mountains rugged, and the country without water. In Arabia, whatever woman was convicted of adultery, was capitally punished. Herodot. 1, 2, 3, & Diod. 1, & 2.—Plin. 12 & 14.—Strab. 16.—Xenoph.—Tibull. 2, el. 2.—Curt. 5, c. 1.—Virg. G. 1, v. 57.——Also, the name of the wife of Egyptus. Apollod.

Arabĭcus sinus, a sea between Egypt and Arabia, different, according to some authors, from the Red Sea, which they suppose to be between Æthiopia and India, and the Arabian gulph further above, between Egypt and Arabia. It is about 40 days sail in length, and not half a day's in its most extensive breadth. Plin. 5, c. 11.—Strab.

Arăbis, Arabius, Arbis, an Indian river. Curt. 9, c. 10.

Arabs & Arăbus, a ſon of Apollo and Babylone, who firſt invented medicine, and taught it in Arabia, which is called after his name. Plin. 7, c. 56.

Aracca & Arecca, a city of Suſiana. Tibull. 4, el. 1.

Arachne, a woman of Colophon, daughter to Idmon a dyer. She was ſo ſkilful in working with the needle, that ſhe challenged Minerva, the goddeſs of the art, to a trial of ſkill. She repreſented on her work the amours of Jupiter with Europa, Antiope, Leda, Aſteria, Danae, Alcmena, &c. but though her piece was perfect and maſterly, ſhe was defeated by Minerva, and hanged herſelf in deſpair, and was changed into a ſpider by the goddeſs. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 1, &c.——A city of Theſſaly.

Arachosia, a city of Aſia, near the Maſſagetæ. It was built by Semiramis.—One of the Perſian provinces beyond the Indus. Plin. 6, c. 23.—Strab. 11.

Arachōtæ & Arachōti, a people of India, who receive their name from the river Arachotus, which flows down from mount Caucaſus. Dionyſ. Perieg. Curt. 9, c. 7.

Arachthias, one of the four capital rivers of Epirus, near Nicopolis, falling into the bay of Ambracia. Strab. 7.

Aracillum, a town of Hiſpania Tarraconenſis. Flor. 4, c. 12.

Aracosii, an Indian nation. Juſtin. 13, c. 4.

Aracynthus, a mountain of Acarnania. Plin. 4, c. 2.—Virg. Ecl. 2, v. 24.

Arădus, an iſland near Phœnicia, joined to the continent by a bridge. Dionyſ. Perieg.

Aræ, rocks in the middle of the Mediterranean, between Africa and Sardinia, where the Romans and Africans ratified a treaty. It was upon them that Æneas loſt the greateſt part of his fleet; they are ſuppoſed to be thoſe iſlands which are commonly called Ægates. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 113.

Aræ Philænorum, a maritime city of Africa, on the borders of Cyrene. Salluſt. Jug. bell.

Arar, a river of Gaul, flowing into the Rhone, over which Cæſar's ſoldiers made a bridge in one day. Cæſ. bell. Gall. 1, c. 12. —Silv. 3, v. 452.

Arărus, a Scythian river flowing through Armenia. Herodot. 4, c. 48.

Arathyrea, a ſmall province of Achaia, afterwards called Aſophis, with a city of the ſame name. Homer Il. 2.—Strab. 8.

Arătus, a Greek poet of Cilicia, about 277 B. C. He was greatly eſteemed by Antigonus Gonatas king of Macedonia, at whoſe court he paſſed much of his time. He wrote a poem on aſtronomy, in which he gives an account of the ſituations, riſing and ſetting, number and motion of the ſtars; the work is without variety. He wrote beſides, hymns and epigrams, &c. and had among his interpreters and commentators many of the learned men of Greece whoſe works are loſt, beſides Cicero, Claudius, and Germanicus Cæſar, who, in their youth, or moments of relaxation, tranſlated the phænomena into Latin verſe. The beſt editions of Aratus are, Grotius' 4to. apud Raphaleng. 1600; and Oxon. 8vo. 1672. Cic. de Nat. D.—Ovid. Am. 1, el. 15, v. 26.—— The ſon of Clinias & Ariſtodama, was born at Sicyon in Achaia, near the river Aſopus. When he was but ſeven years of age, his father, who held the government of Sicyon, was aſſaſſinated by Abantidas, who made himſelf abſolute. After ſome revolutions, the ſovereignty came into the hands of Nicocles, whom Aratus murdered, to reſtore his country to liberty. He was ſo jealous of tyrannical power, that he even deſtroyed a picture which was the repreſentation of a a tyrant. He joined the republic of Sicyon in the Achæan league, which he ſtrengthened, by making a treaty of alliance with the Corinthians, and with Ptolemy king of Egypt. He was choſen chief commander of the forces of the Achæans, and drove away the Macedonians from Athens and Corinth. He made war againſt the Spartans, but was conquered in a battle by their king Cleomenes. To repair the loſſes he had ſuſtained, he ſolicited the aſſiſtance of king Antigonus, and drove away Cleomenes from Sparta, who fled to Egypt, where he killed himſelf. The Ætolians ſoon after attacked the Achæans; and Aratus, to ſupport his character, was obliged to call to his aid, Philip, king of Macedonia. His friendſhip with this new ally did not long continue. Philip ſhewed himſelf cruel and oppreſſive; and put to death ſome of the nobleſt of the Achæans, and even ſeduced the wife of the ſon of Aratus. Aratus, who was now advanced in years, ſhowed his diſpleaſure by withdrawing himſelf from the ſociety and friendſhip of Philip. But this rupture was fatal. Philip dreaded the power and influence of Aratus, and therefore he cauſed him and his ſon to be poiſoned. Some days before his death, Aratus was obſerved to ſpit blood; and when apprized of it by his friends, he replied, "Such are the rewards which a connection with kings will produce." He was buried with great pomp, by his countrymen; and two ſolemn ſacrifices were annually made to him, the firſt on the day that he delivered Sicyon from tyranny, and the ſecond on the day of his birth. During thoſe ſacrifices, which were called Arateia, the prieſts wore a ribbon beſpangled with white and purple ſpots, and the public ſchool-maſter walked in proceſſion at the head of his ſcholars, and was always accompanied by the richeſt and moſt eminent ſenators, adorned with garlands. Aratus died in the 62d year of his age, B. C. 213. He wrote a hiſtory of the Achæan league, much commended by Polybius. Plut. in vitâ.—Pauſ. 2, c. 8.—Cic. de Offic. 2, c. 23.—Strab. 14. Liv. 27, c. 31.—Polyb. 2.

Araxes, a celebrated river which ſeparates Armenia from Media, and falls into the Caſpian ſea. Lucan. 1, v. 19, l. 7, v. 188.—Strab. 8.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 728.—Herodot. 1, c. 202, &c.——Another which falls into the Euphrates.—Another in Europe, now called Volga.

Arbaces, a Mede who revolted with Beleſis againſt Sardanapalus, and founded the empire of Media upon the ruins of the Aſſyrian power, 820 years before the Chriſtian era. He reigned above 50 years, and was famous for the greatneſs of his undertakings, as well as for his valor. Juſtin. 1, c. 3.—Paterc. 1, c. 6.

Arbĕla, a town of Perſia, on the river Lycus, famous for a battle fought there between Alexander and Darius, the 2d of October, B. C. 331. Curt. 5, c. 1.—Plut. in Alex.

Arbĕla, a town of Sicily, whoſe inhabitants were very credulous.

Arbis, a river on the weſtern boundaries of India. Strab.

Arbocăla, a city taken by Annibal as he marched againſt Rome.

Arbuscŭla, an actreſs on the Roman ſtage, who laughed at the hiſſes of the populace, while ſhe received the applauſes of the knights. Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 77.

Arcădia, an inland country of Peloponneſus, ſurrounded on every ſide by land. ſituate between Achaia, Meſſenia, Elis and Argolis. It received its name from Arcas ſon of Jupiter, and was anciently called Drymodes, on account of the great number of oaks (δρυς) it produced, and afterwards called Pelaſgia. The country has been much celebrated by the poets, and was famous for its mountains. The inhabitants were for the moſt part all ſhepherds, who lived upon acorns, were ſkilful warriors, and able muſicians. They thought themſelves more ancient than the moon. Pan the god of ſhepherds chiefly lived among them.—Ariſtotle 4, de met. ſays, that the wine of Arcadia, when placed in a goat's ſkin, near a fire, will become chalky, and at laſt be turned into ſalt. Strab. 8.—Plin. 4, c. 6. —Pauſ. 8, c. 4.—Athen. 14.——A fortified village of Zacynthus.

Arcadius, elder ſon of Theodoſius the Great, ſucceeded his father A. D. 395. Under him the Roman power was divided into the eaſtern and weſtern empire. He made the eaſtern empire his choice, and fixed his reſidence at Conſtantinople; while his brother Honorius was made emperor of the weſt, and lived in Rome. After this ſeparation of the Roman empire, the two powers looked upon one another with indifference; and ſoon after, their indifference was changed into jealouſy, and contributed to haſten their mutual ruin. In the reign of Arcadius, Alaricus attacked the weſtern empire, and plundered Rome. Arcadius married Eudoxia, a bold ambitious woman; and died in the 31ſt year of his age, after a reign of 13 years, in which he bore the character of an effeminate prince, who ſuffered himſelf to be governed by favorites, and who abandoned his ſubjects to the tyranny of miniſters, while he loſt himſelf in the pleaſures of a voluptuous court.

Arcānum, a villa of Cicero's, near the Minturni. Cic. 7. ep. ad Att. 10.

Arcas, a ſon of Jupiter and Caliſto. He nearly killed his mother, whom Juno had changed into a bear. He reigned in Pelaſgia, which from him was called Arcadia, and taught his ſubjects agriculture and the art of ſpinning wool. After his death, Jupiter made him a conſtellation, with his mother. As he was one day hunting, he met a wood nymph, who begged his aſſiſtance, becauſe the tree over which ſhe preſided, and on whoſe preſervation her life depended, was going to be carried away by the impetuous torrent of a river. Arcas changed the courſe of the waters, and preſerved the tree, and married the nymph, by whom he had three ſons, Azan, Aphidas and Elatus, among whom he divided his kingdom. The deſcendants of Azan planted colonies in Phrygia. Aphidas received for his ſhare, Tegea, which on that account has been called the inheritance of Aphidas; and Elatus became maſter of mount Cylene, and ſome time after paſſed into Phocis. Pauſ. 8, c. 4.—Hygin. fab. 155 & 176.—Apollod. 3, c. 8.—Strab. 8.—Ovid. Faſt. 1, v. 470.

Arcena, a town of Phœnicia, where Alexander Severus was born.

Arcens, a Sicilian, who permitted his ſon to accompany Æneas into Italy, where he was killed by Mezentius. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 581, &c.

Arcesilăus, ſon of Battus, king of Cyrene, was driven from his kingdom in a ſedition, and died B. C. 575. The ſecond of that name, died B. C. 550. Polyæn. 8,

8. 41.—Herodot. 4, c. 159.——One of Alexander's generals, who obtained Meſopotamia at the general diviſion of the provinces after the king's death.—A chief of Catana, which he betrayed to Dionyſius the elder. Diod. 14.——A philoſopher of Pitane in Æolia, diſciple of Polemon. He viſited Sardes and Athens, and was the founder of the middle academy, as Socrates founded the ancient, and Carneades the new one. He pretended to know nothing, and accuſed others of the ſame ignorance. He acquired many pupils in the character of teacher; but ſome of them left him for Epicurus, though no Epicurean came to him; which gave him occaſion to ſay, that it is eaſy to make an eunuch of a man, but impoſſible to make a man of an eunuch. He was very fond of Homer, and generally divided his time among the pleaſures of philoſophy, love, reading, and the table. He died in his 75th year, B. C. 241, or 300 according to ſome. Diog. in vitâ.—Perſius 3, v. 78.—Cic. de Finib.——A painter. Pauſ.——A comic and elegiac poet.

ARCĔSIUS, ſon of Jupiter, ſaid to be father to Ulyſſes. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 144.

ARCHÆA, a city of Æolia.

ARCHÆĂNAX of Mitylene, was intimate with Piſiſtratus tyrant of Athens. He fortified Sigæum with a wall from the ruins of ancient Troy. Strab. 13.

ARCHÆATĬDAS, a country of Peloponneſus. Polyb.

ARCHĂGĂTHUS, ſon of Archagathus, was ſlain in Africa by his ſoldiers, B. C. 285. He killed his grandfather Agathocles, tyrant of Syracuſe. Diod. 20.—Juſtin. 22, c. 5, &c. ſays, that he was put to death by Archeſilaus.—A phyſician at Rome, B. C. 219.

ARCHANDER, father-in-law to Danaus. Herodot. 2, c. 98.

ARCHANDROS, a town of Egypt.

ARCHE, one of the Muſes, according to Cicero.

ARCHEGETES, a ſirname of Hercules.

ARCHELĂUS, a name common to ſome Kings of Cappadocia. One of them was conquered by Sylla, for aſſiſting Mithridates.——A perſon of that name married Berenice, and made himſelf king of Egypt; a dignity he enjoyed only ſix months, as he was killed by the ſoldiers of Gabinius, B. C. 56. He had been made prieſt of Comana by Pompey. His grandſon was made king of Cappadocia by Antony, when he aſſiſted at Actium, and maintained his independence under Auguſtus, till Tiberius perfidiouſly deſtroyed him.——A king of Macedonia, ſucceeded his father Perdiccas the ſecond; as he was but a natural child, he killed the legitimate heirs, to gain the kingdom. He proved himſelf to be a great monarch; but he was at laſt killed by one of his favorites, becauſe he had promiſed him his daughter in marriage, and given her to another, after a reign of 23 years. He patronized the poet Euripides. Diod. 14.—Juſtin 7, c. 4.—Ælian. V. H. 2, 8, 12, 14.——A king of the Jews, ſirnamed Herod. He married Glaphyre, daughter of Archelaus king of Macedonia, and widow of his brother Alexander. Cæſar baniſhed him, for his cruelties, to Vienna, where he died. Dio.——A king of Lacedæmon, ſon of Ageſilaus. He reigned 42 years with Charilaus, of the other branch of the family. Herodot. 7, c. 204.—Pauſ. 3, c. 2.——A general of Antigonus the younger, appointed governor of the Acrocorinth, with the philoſopher Perſæus. Polyæn. 6, c. 5.——A celebrated general of Mithridates, againſt Sylla. Id. 8, c. 9.——A philoſopher of Athens or Meſſenia, ſon of Apollodorus, and ſucceſſor to Anaxagoras. He was preceptor to Socrates, and was called Phyſicus. He ſuppoſed that heat and cold were the principles of all things. He firſt diſcovered the voice to be propagated by the vibration of the air. Cic. Tuſc. 5.—Diog. in vitâ. Auguſtin de civ. Dei. 8.——A man ſet over Suſa by Alexander, with a garriſon of 3000 men. Curt. 5, c. 2.——A Greek philoſopher, who wrote a hiſtory of animals, and maintained that goats breathed not through the noſtrils, but through the ears. Plin. 8, c. 50.——A ſon of Electryon and Anaxo. Apollod. 2.——A Greek poet, who wrote epigrams. Varro. de R. R.——A ſculptor of Priene, in the age of Claudius. He made an apotheoſis of Homer, a piece of ſculpture highly admired, and ſaid to have been diſcovered under ground A. D. 1658.——A writer of Thrace.

ARCHEMĂCHUS, a Greek writer, who publiſhed an hiſtory of Eubœa. Athen. 6.——A ſon of Hercules——of Priam, Apollod. 2 & 3.

ARCHEMŌRUS, or Opheltes, ſon of Lycurgus, king of Nemæa, in Thrace, by Eurydice, was brought up by Hypſipyle, queen of Lemnos, who had fled to Thrace, and was employed as a nurſe in the king's family. Hypſipyle was met by the army of Adraſtus, who was going againſt Thrace; and ſhe was forced to ſhew them a fountain where they might quench their thirſt. To do this more expeditiouſly, ſhe put down the child on the graſs, and at her return found him killed by a ſerpent. The Greeks were ſo afflicted at this misfortune, that they inſtituted games in honor of Archemorus, which were called Nemæan, and king Adraſtus inliſted among the combatants, and was victorious. Apollod. 2 & 3.—Pauſ. 8, c. 48.—Stat. Theb. 6.

Archepŏlis, a man in Alexander's army who conſpired againſt the king with Dymnus. Curt. 6, c. 7.

Archeptolĕmus, ſon of Iphitus, king of Elis, went to the Trojan war, and fought againſt the Greeks. As he was fighting near Hector, he was killed by Ajax ſon of Telamon. It is ſaid that he re-eſtabliſhed the Olympic games. Homer. Il. 8, v. 128.

Archestrătus, a tragic poet, whoſe pieces were acted during the Peloponneſian war. Plut. in Ariſt.——A man ſo ſmall and lean, that he could be placed in a diſh without filling it, though it contained no more than an obolus.—A follower of Epicurus, who wrote a poem in commendation of gluttony.

Archetīmus, the firſt philoſophical writer in the age of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece. Diog.

Archetius, a Rutulian, killed by the Trojans. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 459.

Archia, one of the Oceanides, wife to Inachus. Hygin. fab. 143.

Archias, a Corinthian, deſcended from Hercules. He founded Syracuſe, B. C. 732. Being told by an oracle to make choice of health or riches, he choſe the latter. Dionyſ. Hal. 2.——A poet of Antioch, intimate with the Luculli. He obtained the rank and name of a Roman citizen by the means of Cicero, who defended him in an elegant oration, when his enemies had diſputed his privileges of citizen of Rome. He wrote a poem on the Cimbrian war, and began another concerning Cicero's conſulſhip, which are now loſt. Some of his epigrams are preſerved in the Anthologia. Cic. pro Arch.——A Polemarch of Thebes, aſſaſſinated in the conſpiracy of Pelopidas, which he could have prevented, if he had not deferred to the morrow, the reading of a letter which he had received from Archias the Athenian high-prieſt, and which gave him information of his danger. Plut. in Pelop.——A high prieſt of Athens, contemporary and intimate with the Polemarch of the ſame name. Id. ibid.——A Theban taken in the act of adultery, and puniſhed according to the law, and tied to a poſt in the public place, for which puniſhment he aboliſhed the Oligarchy. Ariſtot.

Archibiădes, a philoſopher of Athens, very inimical to the views and meaſures of Phocion. Plut. in Phoc.——An ambaſſador of Byzantium, &c. Polyæn. 4, c. 44.

Archibius, the ſon of the geographer Ptolemy.

Archidamia, a prieſteſs of Ceres, who, on account of her affection for Ariſtomenes, reſtored him to liberty, when he had been taken priſoner by her female attendants at the celebration of their feſtivals. Pauſ. 4, c. 17.——A daughter of Cleadas, who, upon hearing that her countrymen, the Spartans, were debating whether they ſhould ſend away their women, againſt the hoſtile approach of Pyrrhus, ſeized a ſword, and ran to the ſenate houſe, exclaiming that the women were as able to fight as the men. Upon this the decree was repealed. Plut. in Pyrr.—Polyæn. 8, c. 8.

Archidămus, ſon of Theopompus, king of Sparta, died before his father. Pauſ.—Another king of Sparta, ſon of Anaxidamus, ſucceeded by Agaſicles.——Another, ſon of Ageſilaus, of the family of the Proclidæ.——Another, grandſon of Leotychidas, by his ſon Zeuxidamus. He ſucceeded his grandfather, and reigned in conjunction with Pliſtoanax. He conquered the Argives and Arcadians, and privately aſſiſted the Phocians in plundering the temple of Delphi. He was called to the aid of Tarentum againſt the Romans, and killed there in a battle, after a reign of 33 years. Diod. 16.—Xenoph.——Another, ſon of Eudamidas.——Another, who conquered the Helots, after a violent earthquake. Diod. 11.——A ſon of Ageſilaus, who led the Spartan auxiliaries to Cleombrotus at the battle of Leuctra, and was killed in a battle againſt the Lucanians, B. C. 338.——A ſon of Xenius Theopompus. Pauſ.

Archidas, a tyrant of Athens, killed by his troops.

Archidēus, a ſon of Amyntas, king of Macedonia. Juſtin. 7, c. 4.

Archidium, a city of Crete, named after Archidius, ſon of Tegeates. Pauſ. 8, c. 53.

Archigallus, the chief of the prieſts of Cybele.

Archigĕnes, a phyſician, born at Apamea, in Syria. He lived in the reign of Domitian, Nerva, and Trajan, and died in the 73d year of his age. He wrote a treatiſe on adorning the hair, as alſo ten books on fevers. Juv. 6, v. 235.

Archilŏchus, a poet of Paros, who wrote elegies, ſatyrs, odes, and epigrams, and was the firſt who introduced iambics in his verſes. He had courted Neobule, the daughter of Lycambes, and had received promiſes of marriage; but the father gave her to another, ſuperior to the poet in rank and fortune; upon which Archilochus wrote ſuch a bitter ſatyr, that Lycambes hanged himſelf in a fit of deſpair. The Spartans condemned his verſes on account of their petulance, and baniſhed him. He floriſhed 685 B. C. and it is ſaid that he was aſſaſſinated. Some fragments of his poetry remain, which diſplay vigor and animation, boldneſs and vehemence in the higheſt degree; from which reaſon, perhaps Cicero calls virulent edicts, Archilochia edicta. Cic. Tuſc. 1.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Herodot. 1, c. 12.—Horat. art. poet. v. 79.—Athen. 1, 2, &c.——A ſon of Neſtor, killed by Memnon in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2——A Greek hiſtorian, who wrote a chronological table, and other works.

ARCHIMĒDES, a famous geometrician of Syracuſe, who invented a machine of glaſs that faithfully repreſented the motion of all the heavenly bodies. When Marcellus, the Roman conſul, beſieged Syracuſe, Archimedes conſtructed machines which ſuddenly raiſed up in the air the ſhips of the enemy from the bay before the city, and then let them fall with ſuch violence into the water that they ſunk. He ſet them alſo on fire with his burning glaſſes. When the town was taken, the Roman general gave ſtrict orders to his ſoldiers not to hurt Archimedes, and even offered a reward to him who brought him alive and ſafe into his preſence. All theſe precautions were uſeleſs: he was ſo deeply engaged in ſolving a problem, that he was even ignorant that the enemy were in poſſeſſion of the town; and a ſoldier, without knowing who he was, killed him, becauſe he refuſed to follow him, B. C. 212. Marcellus raiſed a monument over him, and placed upon it a cylinder and a ſphere; but the place remained long unknown, till Cicero, during his queſtorſhip in Sicily, found it near one of the gates of Syracuſe, ſurrounded with thorns and prickles. Some ſuppoſe that Archimedes raiſed the ſite of the towns and villages of Egypt, and began thoſe mounds of earth by means of which communication is kept from town to town during the inundations of the Nile. The ſtory of his burning glaſſes had always appeared fabulous to ſome of the moderns, till the experiments of Buffon demonſtrated it beyond contradiction. The manner in which he diſcovered how much braſs a goldſmith had mixed with gold in making a golden crown for the king, is well known to every modern hydroſtatic, as well as the pumping ſcrew which ſtill bears his name. Among the wild ſchemes of Archimedes, is his ſaying, that, by means of his machines, he could move the earth with eaſe, if placed on a fixed ſpot near it. Many of his works are extant, eſpecially treatiſes de ſphæra & cylindro, circuli dimenſio, de lineis ſpiralibus, de quadratura paraboles, de numero arenæ, &c. The beſt edition of which is that of David Rivaltius, fol. Paris, 1615 Cic. Tuſc. 1, c. 25. De Nat. D. 2, c. 34.—Liv. 24, c. 34.—Quintil. 1, c. 10.—Vitruv. 9, c. 3.—Polyb. 7.—Plut. in Marcell.—Val. Max. 8, c. 7.

ARCHĪNUS, a man who, when he was appointed to diſtribute new arms among the populace of Argos, raiſed a mercenary band, and made himſelf abſolute. Polyæn. 3, c. 8.——A rhetorician of Athens.

ARCHIPELĂGUS, a part of a ſea where a great number of iſlands are interſperſed, ſuch as that part of the Mediterranean which lies between Greece and Aſia Minor, and is generally called Mare Ægeum.

ARCHIPŎLIS, a ſoldier who conſpired againſt Alexander with Dymnus. Curt. 6, c. 7.

ARCHIPPE, a city of the Marſi, deſtroyed by an earthquake, and loſt in the lake of Fucinus. Plin. 3, c. 19.

ARCHIPPUS, a king of Italy, from whom perhaps the town of Archippe received its name. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 752.——A philoſopher of Thebes, pupil to Pythagoras.—— An archon at Athens.——A comic poet of Athens, of whoſe 8 comedies only one obtained the prize.——A philoſopher in the age of Trajan.

ARCHĪTIS, a name of Venus, worſhipped on mount Libanus.

ARCHON, one of Alexander's generals, who received the provinces of Babylon, at the general diviſion after the king's death. Diod. 18.

ARCHONTES, the name of the chief magiſtrates of Athens. They were nine in number, and none were choſen but ſuch as were deſcended from anceſtors who had been free citizens of the republic for three generations; they were alſo to be without deformity in all the parts and members of their body, and were obliged to produce teſtimonies of their dutiful behavior to their parents, of the ſervices they had rendered their country, and the competency of their fortune to ſupport their dignity. They took a ſolemn oath, that they would obſerve the laws, adminiſter juſtice with impartiality, and never ſuffer themſelves to be corrupted. If they ever received bribes, they were compelled by the laws to dedicate to the god of Delphi, a ſtatue of gold, of equal weight with their body. They all had the power of puniſhing malefactors with death. The chief among them was called Archon, the year took its denomination from him; he determined all cauſes between man and wife, and took care of legacies and wills; he provided for orphans, protected the injured, and puniſhed drunkenneſs with uncommon ſeverity. If he ſuffered himſelf to be intoxicated during the time of his office, the miſdemeanor was puniſhed with death. The ſecond of the archons was called Baſileus; it was his office to keep good order, and to remove all cauſes of quarrel in the families of thoſe who were dedicated to the ſervice of the gods. The profane and the impious were brought before his tribunal; and he offered public ſacrifices for the good of the ſtate. He aſſiſted at the celebration of the Eleuſinian feſtivals, and other religious ceremonies. His wife was to be related to the whole people of Athens, and of a pure and unſullied life. He had a vote among the Areopagites, but was obliged to ſit among them without his crown. The Polemarch was another archon of inferior dignity. He had the care of all foreigners, and provided a ſufficient maintenance, from the public treaſury, for the families of thoſe who had loſt their lives in the defence of their country. Theſe three chief archons generally choſe each of them two perſons of reſpectable character, and of an advanced age, whoſe counſels and advice might aſſiſt and ſupport them in their public capacity. The ſix other archons were indiſtinctly called Theſmothetæ, and received complaints againſt perſons accuſed of impiety, bribery, and ill behavior. They ſettled all diſputes between the citizens, redreſſed the wrongs of ſtrangers, and forbade any laws to be enforced, but ſuch as were conducive to the ſafety of the ſtate. Theſe officers of ſtate were choſen after the death of king Codrus; their power was originally for life, but afterwards it was limited to 10 years, and at laſt to one year. After ſome time, the qualifications which were required to be an archon were not ſtrictly obſerved. Adrian, before he was elected emperor of Rome, was made archon at Athens, though a foreigner; and the ſame honors were conferred upon Plutarch. The perpetual archons, after the death of Codrus, were Medon, whoſe office began B. C. 1070; Acaſtus, 1050; Archippus, 1014; Theriſippus, 995; Phorbas, 954; Megacles, 923; Diognetus, 893; Pherecles, 865; Ariphron, 846; Theſpieus, 826; Agameſtor, 799; Æſchylus, 778; Alcmæon, 756; after whoſe death the archons were decennial, the firſt of whom was Charops, who began 753; Æſimedes, 744; Clidicus, 734; Hippomenes, 724; Leocrates, 714; Apſander, 704; Eryxias, 694; after whom the office became annual, and of theſe annual archons Creon was the firſt. Ariſtoph. in Nub. & Avib.—Plut. Sympoſ. 1. —Demoſth.—Pollux.—Lyſias.

ARCHĬLUS THURIUS, a general of Dionyſius the elder. Diod. 14.

ARCHĪTAS, a muſician of Mitylene, who wrote a treatiſe on agriculture. Diog.——The ſon of Heſtiæus of Tarentum, was a follower of the Pythagorean philoſophy, and an able aſtronomer and geometrician. He redeemed his maſter, Plato, from the hands of the tyrant Dionyſius, and for his virtues, he was ſeven times choſen, by his fellow citizens, governor of Tarentum. He invented ſome mathematical inſtruments, and made a wooden pigeon which could fly. He periſhed in a ſhipwreck, about 394 years before the Chriſtian era. He is alſo the reputed inventor of the ſcrew and the pulley. A fragment of his writings has been preſerved by Porphyry. Horat. 1, od. 28.—Cic. 3, de Orat —Diog. in vit.

ARCĬTĔNENS, an epithet applied to Apollo, from his bearing a bow, with which, as ſoon as born, he deſtroyed the ſerpent Python. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 75.

ARCTĪNUS, a Mileſian poet, ſaid to be pupil to Homer. Dionyſ. Hal. 1.

ARCTOPHŸLAX, a ſtar near the great bear, called alſo Bootes. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 42.

ARCTOS, a mountain near Propontis, inhabited by giants and monſters.——Two celeſtial conſtellations near the north pole, commonly called Urſa Major and Minor, ſuppoſed to be Arcas and his mother, who were made conſtellations. Virg. G. 1.—Aratus.—Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 107.

ARCTŪRUS, a ſtar near the tail of the great bear, whoſe riſing and ſetting was generally ſuppoſed to portend great tempeſts. Horat. 3, od. 1. The name is derived from its ſituation, ἀρκτος urſus, οὐρὰ cauda. It riſes now about the beginning of October, and Pliny tells us it roſe in his age on the 12th, and, according to Columella, on the 5th of September.

ARDĂLUS, a ſon of Vulcan, ſaid to have been the firſt who invented the pipe. He gave it to the Muſes, who on that account have been called Ardalides, and Ardaliotides. Pauſ. 2, c. 31.

ARDANIA, a country of Egypt. Strab.

ARDAXĀNUS, a ſmall river of Illyricum Polyb.

ARDEA, formerly Ardua, a town of Latium, built by Danae, or according to ſome, by a ſon of Ulyſſes and Circe. It was the capital of the Rutuli. Some ſoldiers ſet it on fire, and the inhabitants publicly reported, that their city had been changed into a bird, called by the Latins Ardea. It was rebuilt, and it became a rich and magnificent city, whoſe enmity to Rome rendered it famous. Tarquin the Proud was preſſing it with a ſiege, when his ſon raviſhed Lucretia. C. Nep. in Attic. 14. —Liv. 1, c. 57. l. 3, c. 71. l. 4, c. 9, &c.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 412.—Ovid. Met. 1, fab. 573.—Strab. 5.

ARDERICCA, a ſmall town on the Euphrates, north of Babylon.

ARDIÆI, a town of Illyricum, whoſe capital was called Ardia. Strab. 7.

ARDONEA, a town of Apulia. Liv. 24, c. 20.

ARDUA, an ancient name of Ardea. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 411.

ARDUENNA, a large foreſt of Gaul, in the time of J. Cæſar, which extended 50 miles from the Rhine to the borders of the Nervii.

ARELLIUS, a celebrated painter of Rome, in the age of Auguſtus. He painted the goddeſſes in the form of his miſtreſſes. Plin. 35, c. 10.——A miſer in Horat.

AREMORĬCA, a part of Gaul, which afterwards received the name of Aquitania. Plin. 4.

ARĒNA & Arene, a city of Meſſenia, in Peloponneſus. Homer. Il. 2.

ARENĂCUM, a town of Germany. Tacit. Hiſt. 5, c. 20.

AREOPAGĪTÆ, the judges of the Areopagus, a ſeat of juſtice on a ſmall eminence near Athens, whoſe name is derived from ἄρεως πάγος, the hill of Mars, becauſe Mars was the firſt who was tried there, for the murder of Hallirhotius, who had offered violence to his daughter Alcippe. Some ſay that the place receives the name of Areopagus, becauſe the Amazons pitched their camp there, and offered ſacrifices to their progenitor Mars, when they beſieged Athens; and others maintain, that the name was given to the place, becauſe Mars is the god of bloodſhed, war and murder, which were generally puniſhed by that court. The time in which this celebrated ſeat of juſtice was inſtituted, is unknown. Some ſuppoſe that Cecrops, the founder of Athens, firſt eſtabliſhed it, while others give the credit of it to Cranaus, and others to Solon. The number of judges that compoſed this auguſt aſſembly, is not known. They have been limited by ſome to 9, to 31, to 51, and ſometimes to a greater number. The moſt worthy and religious of the Athenians were admitted as members, and ſuch archons as had diſcharged their duty with care and faithfulneſs. In the latter ages of the republic, this obſervance was often violated, and we find ſome of their members of looſe and debauched morals. If any of them was convicted of immorality, if they were ſeen ſitting at a tavern, or had uſed any indecent language, they were immediately expelled from the aſſembly, and held in the greateſt diſgrace, though the dignity of a judge of the Areopagus always was for life. The Areopagites took cognizance of murders, impiety, and immoral behavior, and particularly of idleneſs, which they deemed the cauſe of all vice. They watched over the laws, and they had the management of the public treaſury; they had the liberty of rewarding the virtuous, and of inflicting ſevere puniſhment upon ſuch as blaſphemed againſt the gods, or ſlighted the celebration of the holy myſteries. They always ſat in the open air, becauſe they took cognizance of murder; and by their laws, it was not permited for the murderer and his accuſer to be both under the ſame roof. This cuſtom alſo might originate becauſe the perſons of the judges were ſacred, and they were afraid of contracting pollution by converſing in the ſame houſe with men who had been guilty of ſhedding innocent blood. They always heard cauſes and paſſed ſentence in the night, that they might not be prepoſſeſſed in favor of the plaintiff or of the defendant by ſeeing them. Whatever cauſes were pleaded before them, were to be diveſted of all oratory and fine ſpeaking, leſt eloquence ſhould charm their ears, and corrupt their judgement. Hence aroſe the moſt juſt and moſt impartial deciſions, and their ſentence was deemed ſacred and inviolable, and the plaintiff and defendant were equally convinced of its juſtice. The Areopagites generally ſat on the 27th, 28th, and 29th day of every month. Their authority continued in its original ſtate, till Pericles, who was refuſed admittance among them, reſolved to leſſen their conſequence, and deſtroy their power. From that time the morals of the Athenians were corrupted, and the Areopagites were no longer conſpicuous for their virtue and juſtice; and when they cenſured the debaucheries of Demetrius, one of the family of Phalereus, he plainly told them, that if they wiſhed to make a reform in Athens, they muſt begin at home.

AREOPĂGUS, a hill in the neighbourhood of Athens. Vid. Areopagitæ.

ARESTÆ, a people of India, conquered by Alexander. Juſtin. 12, c. 8.

ARESTHANAS, a countryman, whoſe goat ſuckled Æſculapius, when expoſed by his mother. Pauſ. 2, c. 26.

ARĒTA, the mother of Ariſtippus the philoſopher. Laert. 2.——A daughter of Dionyſius, who married Dion. She was thrown into the ſea. Plut. in Dion.——A female philoſopher of Cyrene, B. C. 377.——A daughter of Rhexenor, deſcended from Neptune, who married her uncle Alcinous, by whom ſhe had Nauſicaa. Homer. Od. 7 & 8.—Apollod. 1.

ARETÆUS, a phyſician of Cappadocia, very inquiſitive after the operations of nature. His treatiſe on agues has been much admired. The beſt edition of his works which are extant, is that of Boerhaave, L. Bat. fol. 1735.

ARETAPHĪLA, the wife of Melanippus, a prieſt of Cyrene. Nicocrates murdered her huſband to marry her. She, however, was ſo attached to Melanippus, that ſhe endeavoured to poiſon Nicocrates, and at laſt cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated by his brother Lyſander, whom ſhe married. Lyſander proved as cruel as his brother, upon which Aretaphila ordered him to be thrown into the ſea. After this ſhe retired to a private ſtation. Plut. de Virtut. Mulier.—Polyæn. 8, c. 38.

ARETĂLES, a Cnidian, who wrote an hiſtory of Macedonia, beſides a treatiſe on iſlands. Plut.

ARĒTE. Vid. Areta.

ARĒTES, one of Alexander's officers. Curt. 4, c. 15.

ARETHŪSA, a nymph of Elis, daughter of Oceanus, and one of Diana's attendants. As ſhe returned one day from hunting, ſhe ſat near the Alpheus, and bathed in the ſtream. The god of the river was enamoured of her, and he purſued her over the mountains and all the country, when Arethuſa, ready to ſink under fatigue, implored Diana, who changed her into a fountain. The Alpheus immediately mingled his ſtreams with hers, and Diana opened a ſecret paſſage under the earth and under the ſea, where the waters of Arethuſa diſappeared, and roſe in the iſland of Ortygia, near Syracuſe, in Sicily. The river Alpheus followed her alſo under the ſea, and roſe alſo in Ortygia; ſo that, as mythologiſts relate, whatever is thrown into the Alpheus, in Elis, riſes again, after ſome time, in the fountain Arethuſa near Syracuſe. *Vid. Nothing can ſink under its waters, Plin. 2, c. 103.

ARETĪNUM, a Roman colony in Etruria. Ital. 5, v. 123.

ARETUS, a ſon of Neſtor and Anaxibia. Homer. Od. 3.——A Trojan againſt the Greeks. He was killed by Automedon. Homer. Il. 17.——A famous warrior, whoſe only weapon was an iron club. He was treacherouſly killed by Lycurgus, king of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 11.

AREUS, a king of Sparta, preferred in the ſucceſſion to Cleonymus, brother of Acrotatus, who had made an alliance with Pyrrhus. He aſſiſted Athens when Antigonus beſieged it, and died at Corinth. Pauſ. 3, c. 6.—Plut.——A king of Sparta, who ſucceeded his father Acrotatus 2d, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Leonidas, ſon of Cleonymus.——A philoſopher of Alexandria, intimate with Auguſtus. Sueton. ——A poet of Laconia.——An orator mentioned by Quintil.

ARGÆUS & ARGĒUS, a ſon of Apollo and Cyrene. Juſtin. 13, c. 7.——A ſon of Perdiccas, who ſucceeded his father in the kingdom of Macedonia. Juſtin. 7, c. 1.—— A mountain of Cappadocia, covered with perpetual ſnows, at the bottom of which is the capital of the country called Mazara. Claudian.——A ſon of Ptolemy, killed by his brother. Pauſ. 1.——A ſon of Lycymnius. Apollod. 2.

ARGĂLUS, a king of Sparta, ſon of Amyclas Pauſ. 3, c. 1.

ARGATHŎNA, a huntreſs of Cios in Bithynia, whom Rheſus married before he went to the Trojan war. When ſhe heard of his death, ſhe died in deſpair. Parthen. Erotic. c. 36.

ARGATHŌNIUS, a king of Tarteſſus, who, according to Plin. 7, c. 48, lived 120 years, and 300 according to Ital. 3, v. 396.

ARGE, a beautiful huntreſs, changed into a ſtag by Apollo. Hygin. fab. 205.——One of the Cyclops. Heſiod.——A daughter of Theſpius, by whom Hercules had two ſons. Apollod. 2.——A nymph, daughter of Jupiter and Juno. Apollod. 1.

ARGEA, a place at Rome, where certain Argives were buried.

ARGÆĀTHÆ, a village of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 23.

ARGENNUM, a promontory of Ionia.

ARGES, a ſon of Cœlus and Terra, who had only one eye in his forehead. Apollod. 1, c. 1.

ARGESTRĂTUS, a king of Lacedæmon, who reigned 35 years.

ARGĒUS, a ſon of Perdiccas, king of Macedonia, who obtained the kingdom when Amyntas was depoſed by the Illyrians. Juſtin. 7, c. 2.

ARGI (plur. maſc.) Vid. Argos.

ARGIA, daughter of Adraſtus, married Polynices, whom ſhe loved with uncommon tenderneſs. When he was killed in the war, ſhe buried his body in the night, againſt the poſitive orders of Creon, for which pious action ſhe was puniſhed with death. Theſeus revenged her death by killing Creon. Hygin. fab. 69 & 72.—Stat. Theb. 12. [Vid. Antigone & Creon.]——A country of Peloponneſus, called alſo Argolis, of which Argos was the capital.—One of the Oceanides, Hygin. præf.—The wife of Inachus, and mother of Io. Id. fab. 145.——The mother of Argus, by Polybus. Id. fab. 145.——A daughter of Auteſion, Auteſion, who married Ariſtodemus, by whom ſhe had two ſons, Euryſthenes, and Procles. Apollod. 2.—Pauſ. 4, c. 3.

ARGIAS, a man who founded Chalcedon, A. U. C. 148.

ARGINŪSÆ, three ſmall iſlands near the continent between Mitylene and Methymna, where the Lacedæmonian fleet was conquered by Conon the Athenian. Strab. 13.

ARGIŎPE, a nymph of mount Parnaſſus.

ARGIPHONTES, a ſirname given to Mercury, becauſe he killed the hundred-eyed Argus, by order of Jupiter.

ARGIPPEI, a nation among the Sauromatians, born bald, and with flat noſes. They live upon trees. Herodot. 4, c. 23.

ARGIVA, a ſirname of Juno, worſhipped at Argos. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 547.

ARGĪVI, the inhabitants of the city of Argos and the neighbouring country. The word is indiſcriminately applied by the poets to all the inhabitants of Greece.

ARGIUS, a ſteward of Galba, who privately interred the body of his maſter in his gardens. Tacit. Hiſt. 1, c. 49.

ARGO, the name of the famous ſhip which carried Jaſon and his 54 companions to Colchis, when they reſolved to recover the golden fleece. The derivation of the word Argo has been often diſputed. Some derive it from Argus, the perſon who firſt propoſed the expedition, and who built the ſhip. Others maintain that it was built at Argos, whence its name. Cicero Tuſc. 1, c. 20, calls it Argo, becauſe it carried Grecians, commonly called Argives. Diod. 4, derives the word from ἀργὸς, which ſignifies ſwift. Ptolemy ſays, but falſely, that Hercules built the ſhip, and called it Argo, after a ſon of Jaſon, who bore the ſame name. The ſhip Argo had 50 oars. According to many authors, ſhe had a beam on her prow, cut in the foreſt of Dodona by Minerva, which had the power of giving oracles to the Argonauts. This ſhip was the firſt that ever ſailed on the ſea, as ſome report. After the expedition was finiſhed, Jaſon ordered her to be drawn a ground at the Iſthmus of Corinth, and conſecrated to the god of the ſea. The poets have made her a conſtellation in heaven. Jaſon was killed by a beam which fell from the top, as he ſlept on the ground near it. Hygin. fab. 14. A. P. 2, c. 37.—Catull. De Nupt. Pel. & Thet.—Val. Flacc. 1, v. 93, &c.—Phædr. 4, fab. 6.—Seneca in Medea.—Apollon. Argon.—Apollod. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D.—Plin. 7, c. 56.—Manil. 1.

ARGOLĪCUS SINUS, a bay on the coaſt of Argolis.

ARGŎLIS and ARGIA, a country of Peloponneſus between Arcadia and the Ægean ſea. Its chief city was called Argos.

ARGON, one of the deſcendants of Hercules, who reigned in Lydia 505 years before Gyges. Herodot. 1. c. 7.

ARGONAUTÆ, a name given to thoſe ancient heroes who went with Jaſon on board the ſhip Argo to Colchis, about 79 years before the taking of Troy, or 1263 B. C. The cauſes of this expedition aroſe from the following circumſtance:—Athamas, king of Thebes, had married Ino, the daughter of Cadmus, whom he divorced to marry Nephele, by whom he had two children, Phryxus and Helle. As Nephele was ſubject to certain fits of madneſs, Athamas repudiated her, and took a ſecond time Ino, by whom he had ſoon after two ſons, Learchus and Melicerta. As the children of Nephele were to ſucceed to their father by right of birth, Ino conceived an immortal hatred againſt them, and ſhe cauſed the city of Thebes to be viſited by a peſtilence, by poiſoning all the grain which had been ſown in the earth. Upon this the oracle was conſulted; and as it had been corrupted by means of Ino, the anſwer was, that Nephele's children ſhould be immolated to the gods. Phryxus was apprized of this, and he immediately embarked with his ſiſter Helle, and fled to the court of Æetes, king of Colchis, one of his near relations. In the voyage Helle died, and Phryxus arrived ſafe at Colchis, and was received with kindneſs by the king. The poets have embelliſhed the flight of Phryxus, by ſuppoſing that he and Helle fled through the air on a ram who had a golden fleece and wings, and was endowed with the faculties of ſpeech. This ram, as they ſay, was the offſpring of Neptune's amours, under the form of a ram, with the nymph Theophane. As they were going to be ſacrificed, the ram took them on his back, and inſtantly diſappeared in the air. On their way Helle was giddy, and fell in that part of the ſea which from her was called the Helleſpont. When Phryxus came to Colchis, he ſacrificed the ram to Jupiter, or, according to others, to Mars, to whom he alſo dedicated the golden fleece. He ſoon after married Chalciope the daughter of Æetes; but his father-in-law envied him the poſſeſſion of the golden fleece, and therefore, obtain it, he murdered him. Some time after this event, when Jaſon, the ſon of Æſon, demanded of his uncle Pelias the crown which he uſurped, [vid. Pelias, Jaſon, Æſon.] Pelias ſaid that he would reſtore it to him, provided he avenged the death of their common relation Phryxus, whom Æetes had baſely murdered in Colchis. Jaſon, who was in the vigor of youth, and of an ambitious ſoul, chearfully undertook the expedition, and embarked with all the young princes of Greece in the ſhip Argo. They ſtopped at the iſland of Lemnos, where they remained two years, and raiſed a new race of men from the Lemnian women who had murdered their huſbands. [Vid. Hypſipyle.] After they had left Lemnos, they viſited Samothrace, where they offered ſacrifices to the gods, and thence paſſed to Troas and to Cyzicum. Here they met with a favorable reception from Cyzicus the king of the country. The night after their departure, they were driven back by a ſtorm again on the coaſt of Cyzicum, and the inhabitants, ſuppoſing them to be their enemies the Pelaſgi, furiouſly attacked them. In this nocturnal engagement the ſlaughter was great, and Cyzicus was killed by the hand of Jaſon, who, to expiate the murder he had ignorantly committed, buried him in a magnificent manner, and offered a ſacrifice to the mother of the gods, to whom he built a temple on mount Dyndymus. From Cyzicum they viſited Bebrycia, otherwiſe called Bithynia, where Pollux accepted the challenge of Amycus king of the country, in the combat of the ceſtus, and ſlew him. They were driven from Bebrycia, by a ſtorm, to Salmydeſſa, on the coaſt of Thrace, where they delivered Phineus, king of the place, from the perſecution of the harpies. Phineus directed their courſe through the Cyanean rock or the Symplegades, [vid. Cyaneæ.] and they ſafely entered the Euxine ſea. They viſited the country of the Mariandinians, where Lycus reigned, and loſt two of their companions, Idmon, and Tiphis their pilot. After they had left this coaſt, they were driven upon the iſland of Arecia, where they found the children of Phryxus, whom Æetes their grandfather had ſent to Greece to take poſſeſſion of their father's kingdom. From this iſland they at laſt arrived ſafe in Æa, the capital of Colchis. Jaſon explained the cauſes of his voyage to Æetes; but the conditions on which he was to recover the golden fleece, were ſo hard, that the Argonauts muſt have periſhed in the attempt, had not Medea, the king's daughter, fallen in love with their leader. She had a conference with Jaſon, and after mutual oaths of fidelity in the temple of Hecate, Medea pledged herſelf to deliver the Argonauts from her father's hard conditions, if Jaſon married her, and carried her with him to Greece. He was to tame two bulls, which had brazen feet and horns, and which vomited clouds of fire and ſmoke, and to tie them to a plough made of adamant ſtone, and to plough a field of two acres of ground never before cultivated. After this he was to ſow in the plain, the teeth of a dragon, from which an armed multitude were to riſe up, and to be all deſtroyed by his hands. This done, he was to kill an ever watchful dragon, who was at the bottom of the tree, on which the golden fleece was ſuſpended. All theſe labors were to be performed in one day; and Medea's aſſiſtance, whoſe knowledge of herbs, magic and potions was unparalleled, eaſily extricated Jaſon from all danger, to the aſtoniſhment and terror of his companions, and of Æetes, and the people of Colchis, who had aſſembled to be ſpectators of this wonderful action. He tamed the bulls with eaſe, ploughed the field, ſowed the dragon's teeth, and when the armed men ſprang from the earth, he threw a ſtone in the midſt of them, and they immediately turned their weapons one againſt the other, till they all periſhed. After this he went to the dragon, and by means of enchanted herbs, and a draught which Medea had given him, he lulled the monſter to ſleep, and obtained the golden fleece, and immediately ſet ſail with Medea. He was ſoon purſued by Abſyrtus, the king's ſon, who came up to them, and was ſeized and murdered by Jaſon and Medea. The mangled limbs of Abſyrtus were ſtrewed in the way through which Æetes was to paſs, that his farther purſuit might be ſtopped. After the murder of Abſyrtus, they entered the Palus Mæotis, and by purſuing their courſe towards the left, according to the fooliſh account of poets who were ignorant of geography, they came to the iſland Peuceſtes, and to that of Circe. Here Circe informed Jaſon, that the cauſe of all his calamities aroſe from the murder of Abſyrtus, of which ſhe refuſed to expiate him. Soon after, they entered the Mediterranean by the columns of Hercules, and paſſed the ſtraits of Carybdis and Sylla, where they muſt have periſhed, had not Tethys, the miſtreſs of Peleus, one of the Argonauts, delivered them. They were preſerved from the Sirens by the eloquence of Orpheus, and arrived in the iſland of the Phæacians, where they met the enemy's fleet, which had continued their purſuit by a different courſe. It was therefore reſolved, that Medea ſhould be reſtored, if ſhe had not been actually married to Jaſon; but the wife of Alcinous, the king of the country, being appointed umpire between the Colchians and Argonauts, had the marriage privately conſummated by night, and declared that the claims of Æetes to Medea were now void. From Phæacia the Argonauts came to the bay of Ambracia, whence they were driven by a ſtorm upon the coaſt of Africa, and after many diſaſters at laſt came in ſight of the promontory of Melea in the Peloponneſus, where Jaſon was purified of the murder of Abſyrtus, and ſoon after arrived ſafe in Theſſaly. The impracticability of ſuch a voyage is well known. Apollonius Rhodius gives another account, equally improbable. He ſays, that they ſailed from the Euxine up one of the mouths of the Danube, and that Abſyrtus purſued them by entering another mouth of the river. After they had continued their voyage for ſome leagues, the waters decreaſed, and they were obliged to carry the ſhip Argo acroſs the country to the Adriatic, upwards of 150 miles. Here they met with Abſyrtus, who had purſued the ſame meaſures, and conveyed his ſhips in like manner over the land. Abſyrtus was immediately put to death; and ſoon after, the beam of Dodona [Vid. Argo.] gave an oracle, that Jaſon ſhould never return home if he was not previouſly purified of the murder. Upon this they ſailed to the iſland of Æa, where Circe, who was the ſiſter of Æetes, expiated him without knowing who he was. There is a third tradition, which maintains, that they returned to Colchis a ſecond time, and viſited many places of Aſia. This famous expedition has been celebrated in the ancient ages of the world; it has employed the pen of many writers, and among the hiſtorians, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Apollodorus and Juſtin; and among the poets, Onamacritus, more generally called Orpheus, Apollonius Rhodius, Pindar, and Valerius Flaccus, have extenſively given an account of its moſt remarkable particulars. The number of the Argonauts is not exactly known; the following liſt is drawn from the various authors who have made mention of the Argonautic expedition. Jaſon, ſon of Æſon, as is well known, was the chief of the reſt. His companions were Acaſtus ſon of Pelias, Actor ſon of Hippaſus, Admetus ſon of Pheres, Æſculapius ſon of Apollo, Ætalides ſon of Mercury and Eupoleme, Almenus ſon of Mars, Amphiaraus ſon of Œcleus, Amphidamus ſon of Aleus, Amphion ſon of Hyperaſius, Anceus a ſon of Lycurgus, and another of the ſame name, Areus, Argus the builder of the ſhip Argo, Argus ſon of Phryxus, Armenus, Aſcalaphus ſon of Mars, Aſterion ſon of Cometes, Aſterius ſon of Neleus, Augeas ſon of Sol, Atalanta daughter of Schœneus, diſguiſed in a man's dreſs, Autolycus ſon of Mercury, Azorus, Buphagus, Butes ſon of Teleon, Calais ſon of Boreas, Canthus ſon of Abas, Caſtor ſon of Jupiter, Ceneus ſon of Elatus, Cepheus ſon of Aleus, Cius, Clytius and Iphitus ſons of Eurythus, Coronus, Deucalion ſon of Minos, Echion ſon of Mercury and Antianira, Ergynus ſon of Neptune, Euphemus ſon of Neptune and Macionaſſa, Eribotes, Euryalus ſon of Ciſteus, Eurydamas and Eurythion ſons of Iras, Eurytus ſon of Mercury, Glaucus, Hercules ſon of Jupiter, Idas ſon of Aphareus, Ialmenus ſon of Mars, Idmon ſon of Abas, Iolaus ſon of Iphiclus, Iphiclus ſon of Theſtius, Iphiclus ſon of Philacus, Iphis ſon of Alector, Lynceus ſon of Aphareus, Iritus ſon of Naubolus, Laertes ſon of Arceſius, Laocoon, Leodatus ſon of Bias, Leitus ſon of Alector, Meleager ſon of Œneus, Menœtius ſon of Actor, Mopſus ſon of Amphycus, Nauplius ſon of Neptune, Neleus the brother of Pelias. Neſtor ſon of Neleus, Oileus the father of Ajax, Orpheus ſon of Œager, Palemon ſon of Æolus, Peleus and Telamon ſons of Æacus, Periclymenes ſon of Neleus, Peneleus ſon of Hipalmus, Philoctetes ſon of Pœan, Phlias, Pollux ſon of Jupiter, Polyphemus ſon of Elates, Pœas ſon of Thaumacus, Phanus ſon of Bacchus, Phalerus ſon of Alcon, Phocas and Priaſus ſons of Ceneus one of the Lapithæ, Talaus, Tiphys ſon of Aginus, Staphilus ſon of Bacchus, two of the name of Iphitus, Theſeus ſon of Ægeus, with his friend Pirithous. Among theſe Æſculapius was phyſician, and Tiphys was pilot.

ARGOS, (ſing. neut. & Argi. maſc. plur.) an ancient city, capital of Argolis in Peloponneſus, about two miles from the ſea, on the bay called Argolicus ſinus. Juno was the chief deity of the place. Its kingdom was founded by Inachus, 1856 years before the Chriſtian era, and afterwards it was united to the crown of Mycenæ. Argos was built, according to Euripides, Iphig. in Aulid. v. 152, 534, by ſeven Cyclops, who came from Syria. Theſe Cyclops were not Vulcan's workmen. The nine firſt kings of Argos were called Inachides, in honor of the founder. Their names were Inachus, Phoroneus, Apis, Argus, Chryſaſus, Phorbas, Triopas, Stelenus and Gelanor. Gelanor gave a kind reception to Danaus, who drove him from his kingdom in return for his hoſpitality. The deſcendants of Danaus were called Belides. Agamemnon was king of Argos during the Trojan war; and 80 years after, the Heraclidæ ſeized the Peloponneſus, and depoſed the monarchs. The inhabitants of Argos were called Argivi and Argolici; and this name has been often applied to all the Greeks, without diſtinction. Plin. 7, c. 56.—Pauſ. 2, c. 15, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 7.—Ælian. Æn. 1, v. 40, &c.——A town of Theſſaly, called Pelaſgicon by the Pelaſgians. Lucan. 6, v. 355.——Another in Epirus, called Amphilochium.

ARGUS,

Argus, a king of Argos, who reigned 70 years.——A ſon of Areſtor, whence he is often called Areſtorides. He married Iſmene, the daughter of the Aſopus. As he had an hundred eyes, of which only two were aſleep at one time, Juno ſet him to watch Io, whom Jupiter had changed into a heifer; but Mercury, by order of Jupiter, ſlew him, by lulling all his eyes aſleep with the ſound of his lyre. Juno put the eyes of Argus to the tail of the peacock, a bird ſacred to her. Moſchus Idyl. —Ovid. Od. 17.

Argynnis, a name of Venus, which ſhe received from Argynnus, a favorite youth of Agamemnon, who was drowned in the Cephiſus. Propert.

Argyra, a nymph greatly beloved by a ſhepherd called Solemnus. She was changed into a fountain, and the ſhepherd into a river of the ſame name, whoſe waters make lovers forget the object of their affections. Pauſ. 7, c. 23.——A city of Troas. Alſo the native place of Diodorus Siculus, in Sicily.

Argyraspides, a Macedonian legion which received this name from their ſilver helmets. Curt. 4, v. 13.

Argyre, an iſland beyond the mouth of the river Indus, abounding in metal. Mela. 3, c. 7.

Argyripa, a town of Apulia, built by Diomedes after the Trojan war. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 246.

Aria, a country of Aſia, ſituate at the eaſt of Parthia. Mela. 1, c. 2. l. 2, c. 7. ——The wife of Pætus Cecinna, of Padua, a Roman ſenator who was accuſed of conſpiracy againſt Claudius, and carried to Rome by ſea. She accompanied him, and in the boat ſhe ſtabbed herſelf, and preſented the ſword to her huſband, who followed her example. Plin. 7.

Ariadne, daughter of Minos 2d, king of Crete, by Paſiphae, fell in love with Theſeus, who was ſhut up in the labyrinth to be devoured by the Minotaur. She gave him a clue of thread, by which he extricated himſelf from the different windings of his confinement. After he had conquered the Minotaur, he carried her away according to the promiſe he had made, and married her; but when he arrived at the iſland of Naxos he forſook her, though ſhe was already pregnant, and repaid his love with the moſt endearing tenderneſs. Ariadne was ſo diſconſolate upon being abandoned by Theſeus, that ſhe hung herſelf, according to ſome; but Plutarch ſays, that ſhe lived many years after, and had ſome children by Onarus, the prieſt of Bacchus. According to ſome writers, Bacchus loved her after Theſeus had forſaken her, and he gave her a crown of ſeven ſtars, which, after her death, were made a conſtellation. The Argives ſhewed Ariadne's tomb, and when one of their temples was repaired, her aſhes were found in an earthen urn. Homer, Od. 11, ſays, that Diana detained Ariadne at Naxos. Plut. in Theſ.—Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 2. Heroid. 10. De Art. Am. 2, Faſt. 3, v. 462.—*Catull. de Nupt. Arias, an officer who ſucceeded to the command of the ſurviving army after the death of Cyrus the younger, after the battle of Cynaxa. He made peace with Artaxerxes. Xenoph.

Ariani & Arieni, a people of Aſia. Dionyſ. Perieg. 714.

Ariantas, a king of Scythia, who yearly ordered every one of his ſubjects to preſent him with an arrow. Herodot. 4, v. 81.

Ariamnes, a king of Cappadocia, ſon of Ariarathes 3d.

Ariarathes, a king of Cappadocia, who joined Darius Ochus in his expedition againſt Egypt, where he acquired much glory.——His nephew, the 2d of that name, defended his kingdom againſt Perdiccas, the general of Alexander, but he was defeated and hung on a croſs in the 81ſt year of his age, 321 B. C. ——His ſon, Ariarathes the 3d, eſcaped the maſſacre which attended his father and his followers; and after the death of Perdiccas, he recovered Cappadocia, by conquering Amyntas the Macedonian general. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Ariamnes.——Ariarathes the 4th, ſucceeded his father Ariamnes, and married Stratonice, daughter of Antiochus Theos. He died after a reign of 28 years, B. C. 220, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Ariarathes the 5th, a prince who married Antiochia, the daughter of king Antiochus, whom he aſſiſted againſt the Romans. Antiochus being defeated, Ariarathes ſaved his kingdom from [illegible]ation by paying the Romans a large ſum of money remitted at the inſtance of the king of Pergamus.——His ſon, the 6th of that name, called Philopater, from his piety, ſucceeded him 166 B. C.; an alliance with the Romans ſhielded him againſt the falſe claims that were laid to his crown by one of the favorites of Demetrius king of Syria. He was maintained on his throne by Attalus, and aſſiſted his friends of Rome againſt againſt Ariſtonicus, the uſurper of Pergamus; but he was killed in the war B. C. 130, leaving ſix children, five of whom were murdered by his ſurviving wife Laodice.——The only one who eſcaped Ariarathes 7th was proclaimed king, and ſoon after married Laodice, the ſiſter of Mithridates Eupator, by whom he had two ſons. He was murdered by an illegitimate brother, upon which his widow Laodice gave herſelf and kingdom to Nicomedes king of Bithynia. Mithridates made war againſt the new king, and raiſed his nephew to the throne. The young king, who was the 8th one of the name of Ariarathes, made war againſt the tyrannical Mithridates, by whom he was aſſaſſinated in the preſence of both armies, and the murderer's ſon, a child 8 years old, was placed on the vacant throne. The Cappadocians revolted, and made the late monarch's brother, Ariarathes 9th, king; but Mithridates expelled him, and reſtored his own ſon. The exiled prince died of a broken heart; and Nicomedes of Bithynia, dreading the power of the tyrant, intereſted the Romans in the affairs of Cappadocia. The arbiters wiſhed to make the country free; but the Cappadocians demanded a king, and received Ariobarzanes, B. C. 91. On the death of Ariobarzanes, his brother aſcended the throne, under the name of Ariarathes 10th; but his title was diſputed by Siſenna, the eldeſt ſon of Glaphyra, by Achelaus prieſt of Comăna. M. Antony, who was umpire between the contending parties, decided in favor of Siſenna; but Ariarathes recovered it for a while, tho' he was ſoon after obliged to yield in favor of Archelaus, the ſecond ſon of Glaphyra, B. C. 36.

ARIBBÆUS, a general mentioned by Polyæn, 7, c. 29.

ARĬCIA, an Athenian girl, whom Hippolytus married after he had been raiſed from the dead by Æſculăpius. He built a city in Italy, which he called by her name. He had a ſon by her called Vibius. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 544.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 762, &c.——A very ancient town of Italy, built by Hippolytus, ſon of Theſeus, after he had been raiſed from the dead by Æſculapius, and tranſported into Italy by Diana. In a grove in the neighbourhood of Aricia, Theſeus built a temple to Diana, where he eſtabliſhed the ſame rites as were in the temple of that goddeſs in Tauris. The prieſt of this temple was always a fugitive, and the murderer of his predeceſſor, and went always armed with a dagger, to prevent whatever attempts might be made upon his life by one who wiſhed to be his ſucceſſor. The Arician foreſt was very celebrated, and no horſes would ever enter it, becauſe Hippolytus had been killed by them. Egeria whom Numa viſited, generally reſided in this famous grove, which was ſituate in the Appian way, beyond mount Albanus. Ovid. Met. 15. Faſt. 3, v. 263. —Lucan. 6, v. 74.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 761, &c.

ARICĪNA, a ſirname of Diana, from her temple near Aricia. [Vid. Aricia.]——The mother of Octavius. Cic. 3. Phil. c. 6.

ARIDÆUS, a companion of Cyrus the younger. After the death of his friend, he reconciled himſelf with Artaxerxes, by betraying to him the ſurviving Greeks in their return. Diod.——An illegitimate ſon of Philip, who, after the death of Alexander, was made king, till Roxane, who was pregnant by Alexander, brought into the world a legitimate male ſucceſſor. Aridæus had not the free enjoyment of his ſenſes; and therefore Perdiccas, one of Alexander's generals, declared himſelf his protector, and even married his ſiſter, to ſtrengthen their connection. He was ſeven years in poſſeſſion of the ſovereign power, and was put to death, with his wife Eurydice, by Olympias. Juſtin. 9, c. 8.—Diod.

ARIĒNIS, daughter of Alyattes, married Aſtyages king of Media. Herodot. 1, c. 74.

ARIGÆUM, a town of India, which Alexander found burnt, and without inhabitants. Arrian. 4.

ARII, a ſavage people of India.—Of Arabia. Plin. 6.——Of Scythia. Herodot. ——Of Germany. Tacit.

ARĪMA, a place of Cilicia or Syria, where Typhœus was overwhelmed under the ground. Homer. Il. 2.

ARIMASPI, a people conquered by Alexander the Great. Curt. 7, c. 3.

ARIMASPIAS, a river of Scythia with golden ſands. The neighbouring inhabitants have but one eye in the middle of their forehead, and wage continual war againſt the Griffins, monſtrous animals that collect the gold of the rivers. Plin. 7, c. 2.—Herodot. 3 & 4.—Strab. 1 & 13.

ARIMASTHÆ, a people near the Euxine ſea. Orpheus. Argon.

ARIMAZES, a powerful prince of Sogdiana, who treated Alexander with much inſolence, and even aſked, whether he could fly, to aſpire to ſo extenſive a dominion? He ſurrendered, and was expoſed on a croſs with his friends and relations. Curt. 7, c. 11.

ARIQMEDES, a pilot of Xerxes.

ARION, a famous Lyric poet and muſician, ſon of Cyclos, of Methymna, in the iſland of Leſbos. He went into Italy with Periander, tyrant of Corinth, where he obtained immenſe riches by his profeſſion. Some time after, he wiſhed to reviſit his country; and the ſailors of the ſhip in which he embarked, reſolved to murder him, to obtain the riches which he was carrying to Leſbos. Arion ſeeing them immoveable in their reſolutions, begged that he might be permitted to play ſome melodious tune; and as ſoon as he had finiſhed it, he threw himſelf into the ſea. A number of dolphins had been attracted round the ſhip by the ſweetneſs of his muſic; and it is ſaid, that one of them carried him ſafe on his back to Tænarus, whence he haſtened to the court of Periander, who ordered all the ſailors to be crucified at their return. Hygin. fab. 194.—Herodot. 1, c. 23 & 24.—Ælian. de Nat. An. 13, c. 45.—Ital. 11.—Propert. 2, el. 26, v. 17.—Plut. in Symp.——A horſe, ſprung from Ceres and Neptune. Ceres, when ſhe travelled over the world in queſt of her daughter Proſerpine, had taken the figure of a mare, to avoid the importuning addreſſes of Neptune. The god changed himſelf alſo into a horſe, and from their union aroſe the horſe Arion, who had the power of ſpeech, the feet on the right ſide like thoſe of a man, and the reſt of the body like a horſe. Arion was brought up by the Nereides, who often harnaſſed him to his father's chariot, which he drew over the ſea with uncommon ſwiftneſs. Neptune gave him to Copreus, who preſented him to Hercules. Adraſtus, king of Argos, received him as a preſent from Hercules, and with this wonderful animal he won the prize at the Nemæan games. Arion, therefore, is often called the horſe of Adraſtus. Paſ. 8, c. 25.—Propert. 2, el. 34, v. 37.—Apollod. 3, c. 6.

ARIOVISTUS, a king of Germany, who profeſſed himſelf a friend of Rome. When Cæſar was in Gaul, Arioviſtus marched againſt him, and was conquered with the loſs of 80,000 men. Cæſ. 1. bell. Gall.—Tacit. 4 Hiſt.

ARIS, a river of Meſſenia. Paſ. 4, c. 31.

ARISBA, a town of Leſbos, deſtroyed by an earthquake.——A colony of the Mitylenæans in Troas, deſtroyed by the Trojans before the coming of the Greeks. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 264.—Homer. Il. 7.——The name of Priam's firſt wife.

ARISTÆNETUS, a writer whoſe epiſtles have been beautifully edited by Abreſch. Zwoliæ, 1749.

ARISTÆUM, a city of Thrace, at the foot of mount Hæmus. Plin. 4, c. 11.

ARISTÆUS, ſon of Apollo and the nymph Cyrene, was born in the deſerts of Libya, and brought up by the Seaſons, and fed upon nectar and ambroſia. His fondneſs for hunting has procured him the ſirname of Nomus and Agreus. After he had travelled over the greateſt part of the world, he came to ſettle in Greece, where he married Autonoe, the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he had a ſon called Actæon. He fell in love with Eurydice, the wife of Orpheus, and purſued her in the fields. She was ſtung by a ſerpent that lay in the graſs, and died, for which the gods deſtroyed all the bees of Ariſtæus. In this calamity he applied to his mother, who directed him to ſeize the ſea-god Proteus, and conſult him how he might repair the loſſes he had ſuſtained. Proteus adviſed him to appeaſe the manes of Eurydice by the ſacrifice of four bulls and four heifers; and as ſoon as he had done it, and left them in the air, ſwarms of bees immediately ſprang from the rotten carcaſes, and reſtored Ariſtæus to his former proſperity. Some authors ſay, that Ariſtæus had the care of Bacchus when young, and that he was initiated initiated in the myſteries of this god. Ariſtæus went to live on mount Hæmus, where he died. He was, after death, worſhipped as a demi-god. Ariſtæus is ſaid to have learned from the nymphs, the cultivation of olives, and the management of bees, &c. which he afterwards communicated to the reſt of mankind. Virg. G. 4, v. 317.—Diod. 4.—Juſtin. 13, c. 7.—Ovid. Faſt. 1, v. 363.—Cic. de. Nat. D. 3, c. 18.—Pauſ. 10, c. 17.—Hygin. fab. 161, 180, 247.—Apollod. 3, c. 4.—Herodot. 4, c. 4, &c.—Polyæn. 1, c. 24.——A general who commanded the Corinthian forces at the ſiege of Potidæa. He was taken by the Athenians, and put to death.

ARISTAGŌRAS, a writer who compoſed an hiſtory of Egypt. Plin. 36, c. 12.——A ſon-in-law of Hiſtiæus, tyrant of Miletus, who revolted from Darius, and incited the Athenians againſt Perſia, and burnt Sardis. This ſo exaſperated the king, that every evening before ſupper he ordered his ſervants to remind him of puniſhing Ariſtagoras. He was killed in a battle he fought againſt the Perſians, B. C. 499. Herodot. 5, c. 30, &c. l. 7, c. 8.—Polyæn. 1, c. 24.——A man of Cyzicus.——Another of Cumæ. Herodot. 4.

ARISTANDROS, a ſtatuary of Sparta. Pauſ. 3, c. 18.

ARISTARCHE, a matron of Epheſus, who by order of Diana ſailed to the coaſts of Gaul with the Phocæans, and was made prieſteſs. Strab. 4.

ARISTARCHUS, a celebrated grammarian of Samos, diſciple of Ariſtophanes. He lived the greateſt part of his life at Alexandria, and Ptolemy Philometor entruſted him with the education of his ſons. He was famous for his critical powers, and he reviſed the poems of Homer with ſuch ſeverity, that ever after all ſevere critics were called Ariſtarchi. He wrote above 800 commentaries on different authors, much eſteemed in his age. In his old age he became dropſical, upon which he ſtarved himſelf, and died in his 72d year, B. C. 157. He left two ſons, called Ariſtarchus and Ariſtagoras, both famous for their ſtupidity. Horat. de Art. Poet. v. 449.—Ovid. 3 ex Pont. ep. 9, v. 24.—Cic. ad. Fam. 3 ep. 11. ad Attic. 1, ep. 14.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.——A tragic poet of Tegea in Arcadia, about 454 years B. C. He compoſed 70 tragedies, of which two only were rewarded with the prize. One of them, called Achilles, was tranſlated into Latin verſe by Ennius.—A phyſician to queen Berenice, the widow of Antiochus. Polyæn. 8.——An orator of Ambracia.—An aſtronomer of Samos, who firſt ſuppoſed that the earth turned round its axis, and revolved round the ſun. This doctrine nearly proved fatal to him, as he was accuſed of diſturbing the peace of the gods Lares. The age in which he floriſhed, is not preciſely known. His treatiſe on the largeneſs of the ſun, and its diſtance, is extant, of which the beſt edition is that of Oxford, 8vo. 1688.

ARISTAZĀNES, a noble Perſian in favor with Artaxerxes Ochus. Diod. 16.

ARISTEAS, a poet of Proconneſus, who appeared ſeven years after his death to his countrymen, and 540 years after to the people of Metapontum in Italy, and commanded them to raiſe him a ſtatue near the temple of Apollo. He wrote an epic poem on the Arimaſpi in three books, and ſome of his verſes are quoted by Longinus.——A phyſician of Rhodes.——A geometrician, intimate with Euclid. Herodot. 4, c. 13, &c.——A poet, ſon of Demochares, in the age of Crœſus.

ARISTĒRÆ, an iſland on the coaſt of Peloponneſus. Pauſ. 2, c. 34.

ARISTEUS, a man of Argos, who excited king Pyrrhus to take up arms againſt his countrymen, the Argives. Polyæn. 8, c. 68.

ARISTHENES, a ſhepherd who found Æſculapius when he had been expoſed in the woods by his mother Coronis.

ARISTHUS, an hiſtorian of Arcadia. Dionyſ. Hal. 1.

ARISTĪBUS, a river of Pæonia. Polyæn. 4, c. 12.

ARISTĪDES, a celebrated Athenian, ſon of Lyſimachus, in the age of Themiſtocles, whoſe great temperance and virtue procured him the ſirname of Juſt. He was rival to Themiſtocles, by whoſe influence he was baniſhed for ten years, B. C. 484; but before ſix years of his exile had elapſed, he was recalled by the Athenians. He was at the battle of Salamis, and was appointed chief commander with Pauſanias againſt Mardonius, whom they defeated at Platæa. He died ſo poor, that the expences of his funeral were defrayed at the public charge: his two daughters, on account of their father's virtues, received a dowry from the public treaſury when they were come to marriageable years; but poverty became hereditary and the grandſon of Ariſtides was ſeen in the public ſtreets getting his livelihood by explaining dreams. The Athenians became more virtuous in the imitation of their leader; and from the ſenſe of his great qualities, at the repreſentation of one of the tragedies of Æſchylus, on the mention of a ſentence concerning moral goodneſs, the eyes of the audience were all at once once turned from the actor to Ariſtides. When he ſat as judge, it is ſaid that the plaintiff, in his accuſation, mentioned the injuries his opponent had done to Ariſtides. "Mention the wrongs you have received," replied the equitable Athenian.—"I ſit here as judge, and the lawſuit is yours, and not mine." C. Nep. & Plut. in Vitâ.——An hiſtorian of Miletus, fonder of ſtories and anecdotes than of truth. He wrote an hiſtory of Italy, of which the 40th volume has been quoted by Plut. in Parall.——An Athlete, who obtained a prize at the Olympian, Nemean, and Pythian games. Paſ. 6, c. 16.——A painter of Thebes in Bœotia, for one of whoſe pieces Attalus offered 6000 ſeſterces. Plin. 7 & 35.——A Greek orator who wrote 50 orations, beſides other tracts. When Smyrna was deſtroyed by an earthquake, he wrote ſo pathetic a letter to M. Aurelius, that the emperor ordered the city immediately to be rebuilt, and a ſtatue was in conſequence raiſed to the orator. His works conſiſt of hymns in proſe in honor of the gods, funeral orations, apologies, panegyrics, and harangues, the beſt edition of which is that of Jebb, 2 vols. 4to. Oxon. 1722, and that in a ſmaller ſize in 12mo, 3 vols. of Canterus apud P. Steph. 1604.——A man of Locris, who died by the bite of a weaſel. Ælian. V. H. 14.——A philoſopher of Myſia, intimate with M. Antoninus.——An Athenian, who wrote treatiſes on animals, trees, and agriculture.

ARISTIPPUS the elder, a philoſopher of Cyrene, diſciple to Socrates, and founder of the Cyrenaic ſect. He was one of the flatterers of Dionyſius of Sicily, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf for his epicurean voluptuouſneſs, in ſupport of which he wrote a book, as likewiſe an hiſtory of Libya. When travelling in the deſarts of Africa, he ordered his ſervants to throw away the money they carried, as too burdenſome. Many of his ſayings and maxims are recorded by Diogenes, in his life. Horat. 2. Sat. 3, v. 100.——His grandſon of the ſame name, called the younger, was a warm defender of his opinions, and ſupported that the principles of all things were pain and pleaſure. He flouriſhed about 363 years B. C.—A tyrant of Argos, whoſe life was one continued ſeries of apprehenſion. He was killed by a Cretan, in a battle againſt Aratus, B. C. 242. Diog.——A man who wrote an hiſtory of Arcadia. Diog. 2.

M. ARISTIUS, a tribune of the ſoldiers in Cæſar's army. Cæſ. bell. Gall. 7, c. 42.——Another. Vid. Fuſcus.——A ſatyriſt, who wrote a poem called Cyclops.

ARISTOBŪLUS, a name common to ſome of the high prieſts and kings of Judæa, &c. Joſeph.——A brother of Epicurus.——One of Alexander's attendants, who wrote the king's life, replete with adulation and untruth.——A philoſopher of Judæa, B. C. 150.

ARISTOCLĒA, a beautiful woman, ſeen naked by Strato, as ſhe was offering a ſacrifice. She was paſſionately loved by Calliſthenes, and was equally admired by Strato. The two rivals ſo furiouſly contended for her hand, that ſhe died during their quarrel, upon which Strato killed himſelf, and Calliſthenes was never ſeen after. Plut. in Amat.

ARISTŎCLES, a peripatetic philoſopher of Meſſenia, who reviewed, in a treatiſe on philoſophy, the opinions of his predeceſſors. The 14th book of this treatiſe is quoted, &c.—He alſo wrote on rhetoric, and likewiſe nine books on morals.——A grammarian of Rhodes.——A ſtoick of Lampſacus.——An hiſtorian. Strab. 4.——A muſician. Athen. &c.——A prince of Tegea, &c. Polyæn.——This name is common to many Greeks, of whom few or no particulars are recorded.

ARISTOCLĪDES, a tyrant of Orchomenus, who, becauſe he could not win the affection of Stymphalis, killed her and her father, upon which all Arcadia took up arms and deſtroyed the murderer.

ARISTOCRĂTES, a king of Arcadia, put to death by his ſubjects, for offering violence to the prieſteſs of Diana. Paſ. 8, c. 5. His grandſon of the ſame name, was ſtoned to death for taking bribes, during the ſecond Meſſenian war, and being the cauſe of the defeat of his Meſſenian allies, B. C. 682. Id. ibid.——A Rhodian.——A man who endeavoured to deſtroy the democratical power at Athens.——An Athenian general ſent to the aſſiſtance of Corcyra with 25 gallies. Diod. 15.——An Athenian who was puniſhed with death for flying from the field of battle.——A Greek hiſtorian, ſon of Hyparchus. Plut. in Lyc.

ARISTOCREON, the writer of a book on geography.

ARISTOCRĬTUS, wrote a treatiſe concerning Miletus.

ARISTODĒMUS, ſon of Ariſtomachus, was one of the Heraclidæ. He, with his brothers Temenus and Chreſphontes, invaded Peloponneſus, conquered it, and divided the country among themſelves, 1104 years before the Chriſtian era. Paſ. 2, c. 18, &c. He was killed by the ſons of Pylades and Electra, or, as others ſay, by Apollo. Id. 3, c. 1.——A king of Meſſenia, who maintained a famous war againſt Sparta. After ſome loſſes, he recovered his ſtrength, and ſo effectually defeated the enemy's forces, that they were obliged to proſtitute their women to re-people their country.

country. The offspring of this proſtitution were called Partheniæ, and 30 years after their birth they left Sparta and ſeized upon Tarentum. Ariſtodemus put his daughter to death for the good of his country; but being afterwards perſecuted in a dream by her manes, he killed himſelf, after a reign of ſix years and ſome months, in which he had obtained much military glory, B. C. 724. His death was lamented by his countrymen, who did not appoint him a ſucceſſor, but only inveſted Damis, one of his friends, with abſolute power to continue the war, which was at laſt terminated after much bloodſhed and many loſſes on both ſides. Pauſ. in Meſſen. ——The father of Euryſthenes and Procles, was the firſt king of Lacedæmon, of the Heraclidæ. Apollod. 2.——A tyrant of Cumæ.——A philoſopher of Ægina.——An Alexandrian who wrote ſome treatiſes, &c.——A Spartan, who taught the children of Pauſanias.——A man who was preceptor to the children of Pompey.——A tyrant of Arcadia.——A Carian, who wrote an hiſtory of painting.——A philoſopher of Nyſa. B. C. 68.

Aristogĕnes, a phyſician of Cnidos, who attained great reputation by the cure of Demetrius Gonatas, king of Macedonia. ——A Thaſian who wrote 24 books on medicine.

Aristogĭton & Harmodius, two celebrated friends of Athens, who, by their joint efforts, delivered their country from the tyranny of the Piſiſtratidæ, B. C. 510. They received immortal honors from the Athenians, and had ſtatues raiſed to their memory. Theſe ſtatues were carried away by Xerxes when he took Athens. The conſpiracy of Ariſtogiton was ſo ſecret, that it is ſaid a courtezan bit her tongue off, not to betray the truſt repoſed in her. Pauſ. 1, c. 29.—Herodot. 5, c. 55.—Plut. de 10 Orat. ——An Athenian orator, ſirnamed Canis, for his impudence. He wrote orations againſt Timarchus, Timotheus, Hyperides, and Thraſyllus.——A ſtatuary. Pauſ.

Temenus and Ariſtodemus, called Heraclidæ, conquered Peloponneſus. Pauſ. 2, c. 7, l. 3, c. 15.—Herodot. 6, 7, & 8. ——A man who laid aſide his ſovereign power at Argos, at the perſuaſion of Aratus. Pauſ. 2, c. 8.

Aristomĕdes, a Theſſalian general in the intereſt of Darius 3d. Curt. 3, c. 9.

Aristomĕnes, a commander of the fleet of Darius on the Helleſpont, conquered by the Macedonians. Curt. 4, c. 1.——A famous general of Meſſenia, who encouraged his countrymen to ſhake off the Lacedæmonian yoke, under which they labored for above 30 years. He once defended the virtue of ſome Spartan women, whom his ſoldiers had attempted; and when he was taken priſoner and carried to Sparta, the women whom he had protected intereſted themſelves ſo warmly in his cauſe that they procured his liberty. He refuſed to aſſume the title of king, but was ſatisfied with that of commander. He acquired the ſirname of Juſt, from his equity, to which he joined the true valor, ſagacity, and perſeverance of a general. He often entered Sparta without being known, and was ſo dexterous in eluding the vigilance of the Lacedæmonians, who had taken him captive, that he twice eſcaped from them. As he attempted to do it a third time, he was unfortunately killed, and his body being opened, his heart was found all covered with hair. He died 671 years B. C. and it is ſaid that he left dramatical pieces behind him. Diod. 15.—Pauſ. in Meſſen.——A Spartan ſent to the aſſiſtance of Dionyſius. Polyæn. 2.

Ariston, the ſon of Agaſicles, king of Sparta. Being unable to raiſe children by two wives, he married another, famous for her beauty, by whom he had, after ſeven months, a ſon, whom he had the imprudence to call not his own. Herodot. 6, c. 61, &c.——A general of Ætolia.——A ſculptor.——A Corinthian who aſſiſted the Syracuſans againſt the Athenians.——An officer in Alexander's army.——A tyrant of Methymna, who, being ignorant that Chios had ſurrendered to the Macedonians, entered into the harbor, and was taken and put to death. Curt. 4, c. 9.——A philoſopher of Chios, pupil to Zeno the ſtoic, and founder of a ſect which continued but a little while. He ſupported that the nature of the divinity is unintelligible. It is ſaid that he died by the heat of the ſun, which fell too powerfully upon his bald head. In his old age he was much given to ſenſuality. Diog.——A lawyer in Trajan's reign, whoſe eulogium has been written by Pliny, 22 epiſt. lib. 1.——A peripatetic philoſopher of Alexandria, who wrote concerning the courſe of the Nile. Strab.——A wreſtler of Argos, under whom Plato performed ſome exerciſes. ——A muſician of Athens.——A tragic poet.——A peripatetic of Cos.——A native of Pella, in the age of Adrian, who wrote on the rebellion of the Jews.

ARISTONIDES, a noble ſtatuary. Plin. 34.

ARISTONŸMUS, a comic poet under Philadelphus, keeper of the library of Alexandria. He died of a retention of urine, in his 77th year. Athen.——One of Alexander's muſicians Plut. in Alex.

ARISTOPHĂNES, a celebrated comic poet of Athens, ſon of Philip of Rhodes. He wrote 54 comedies, of which only 11 are come down to us. He lived in the age of Socrates, Demoſthenes, and Euripides, B. C. 434, and laſhed the vices of his age with a maſterly hand. The wit and excellence of his comedies are well known; but they abound ſometimes too much with obſcenity, and his attack upon the venerable character of Socrates has been always cenſured, and with juſtice. As a reward of his mental greatneſs, the poet received a crown of olive, in a public aſſembly; but if he deſerved praiſe, he merited blame for his licentiouſneſs, which ſpared not even the gods, and was ſo offenſive to his countrymen that Alcibiades made a law at Athens, which forbade the comic writers from mimicking or repreſenting on the ſtage any living character by name. Ariſtophanes has been called the prince of ancient comedy, as Mnander of the new. The play called Nubes is pointedly againſt Socrates, and the philoſopher is expoſed to ridicule, and his precepts placed in a moſt ludicrous point of view, by the introduction of one of his pupils in the characters of the piece. It is ſaid that St. Chryſoſtom uſed to keep the comedies of Ariſtophanes under his pillow, on account of the brilliancy of the compoſition. Plutarch has made a compariſon between the princes of the new and old comedy, which abound with many anecdotes concerning theſe original characters. The beſt editions of the works of Ariſtophanes, are, Kuſter's, fol. Amſt. 1710, and the 12mo. L. Bat. 1670, and that of Brunck, 4 vols. 8vo. Argent. 1783, which would ſtill be more perfect did it contain the valuable Scholia. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Paterc. 1, c. 16.—Horat. 1, Sat. 4 v. 1.——A grammarian of Byzantium, keeper of the library of Alexandria under Ptolemy Evergetes. He wrote a treatiſe on the harlots of Attica. Diog. in Plat. & Epic. Athen. 9.——A Greek hiſtorian of Bœotia, quoted by Plut. de Herod. Malig.——A writer on agriculture.

ARISTOPHĪLIDES, a king of Tarentum in the reign of Darius ſon of Hyſtaſpes. Herodot. 3.

ARISTŎPHON, a painter in the age of Socrates. He drew the picture of Alcibiades ſoftly reclining on the boſom of the courtezan Nemea, and all the people of Athens ran in crouds to be ſpecta ors of the maſterly piece. He alſo made a painting of Mars leaning on the arm of Venus. Athen. 13.—Plin. 35, c. 11.——A comic poet in the age of Alexander, many of whoſe fragments are collected in Athenæus.

ARISTOR, the father of Argus the hundred eyed keeper of Io.

ARISTORĬDES, the patronymic of Argus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 624.

ARISTOTELĔIA, feſtivals in honor of Ariſtotle, becauſe he obtained the reſtitution of his country from Alexander.

ARISTOTĔLES, a famous philoſopher, ſon of Nicomachus, a phyſician at Peſtrada, born at Stagira. After his father's death he went to Athens, to hear Plato's lectures, where he ſoon ſignalized himſelf by the brightneſs of his genius. He had been of an inactive and diſſolute diſpoſition in his youth, but now he applied himſelf with uncommon diligence, and after he had ſpent 20 years in hearing the inſtructions of Plato, he opened a ſchool for himſelf, for which he was accuſed of ingratitude and illiberality by his ancient maſter. He was moderate in his meals; he ſlept little, and always had one arm out of his couch with a bullet in it, which, by falling into a brazen baſon underneath, early awakened him. He was, according to ſome, 10 years preceptor to Alexander, who received his inſtructions with much pleaſure and deference, and always reſpected him. According to Plutarch, the improvement that Alexander made under Ariſtotle, was of more ſervice to him than all the ſplendor and power which he received from Philip. Almoſt all his writings, which are compoſed on a variety of ſubjects, are extant: he gave them to Theophraſtus at his death, and they were bought by one of the Ptolemies, and placed in the famous library of Alexandria. Diogenes Laertes has given us a very extenſive catalogue of them. Ariſtotle had a deformed countenance, but his genius was a ſufficient compenſation for all his perſonal defects. He has been called by by Plato the philoſopher of truth; and Cicero compliments him with the title of a man of eloquence, univerſal knowledge, readineſs and acuteneſs of invention, and fecundity of thought. The writings of Ariſtotle have been compared with thoſe of Plato; but the one are the effuſions of a lively and fruitful imagination, whilſt the philoſopher of Stagira ſtudied nature more than art, and had recourſe to ſimplicity of expreſſion more than ornament. He neither worſhipped nor cared for the divinity, concerning which his opinions were ever various and diſſonant; and the more he diſregarded the mythology of the ancients, the greater was the credit he acquired over his leſs philoſophical predeceſſors. He was ſo authoritative in his opinions, that, as Bacon obſerves, he wiſhed to eſtabliſh the ſame dominion over men's minds, as his pupil over nations. Alexander, it is ſaid, wiſhed and encouraged his learned tutor to write the hiſtory of animals; and the more effectually to aſſiſt him, he ſupplied him with 800 talents, and, in his Aſiatic expedition, employed above a thouſand men to collect animals, either in fiſhing, hunting, or hawking, which were carefully tranſmitted to the philoſopher. Ariſtotle's logic has long reigned in the ſchools, and been regarded as the perfect model of all imitation. As he expired, the philoſopher is ſaid to have uttered the following ſentiment; Fæde hunc mundum intravi, anxius vixi, perturbatus egredior, cauſa cauſarum miſerere mei. The letter which Philip wrote to Ariſtotle, has been preſerved, and is in theſe words: "I inform you I have a ſon; I thank the gods, not ſo much for making me a father, as for giving me a ſon in an age when he can have Ariſtotle for his inſtructor. I hope you will make him a ſucceſſor worthy of me, and a king worthy of Macedonia." Ariſtotle wiſhed to make his wife Pythias a deity, and to pay her the ſame worſhip as was paid to Ceres. He died in the 63d year of his age, B. C. 322. His treatiſes have been publiſhed ſeparately; but the beſt edition of the works collectively, is that of Duval, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1629. He had a ſon whom he called Nicomachus, by the courtezan Herpyllis. Some have accuſed him of being acceſſary to the death of Alexander, and ſaid that he drowned himſelf in the Euripus, becauſe he could not find out the cauſe of its flux and reflux. There are different reports about the manner of his death, and ſome believe that he died at Athens of a cholic, two years after Alexander's death. The people of Stagira inſtituted feſtivals in his honor, becauſe he had been very ſerviceable to their city. Diog. in vitâ—Plut. in Alex. & de Alex. fort. &c.—Cic. Acad. Max. 5. c. 6, &c.——There were beſides ſeven of the ſame name: A magiſtrate of Athens.——A commentator on Homer's Iliad.——An orator of Sicily, who anſwered the panegyric of Iſocrates.——A friend of Æſchines.——A man of Cyrene who wrote on poetry.——A ſchoolmaſter mentioned in Plato's life, written by Ariſtoxenus.——An obſcure grammarian. Diog. de Ariſtot.

Aristotīmus, a tyrant of Elis, 271 years B. C. Pauſ. 5, c. 5.

Aristoxĕnus, a celebrated muſician, diſciple of Ariſtotle. He wrote 453 different treatiſes on philoſophy, hiſtory, &c. and was diſappointed in his expectations of ſucceeding in the ſchool of Ariſtotle, for which he always ſpoke with ingratitude of his learned maſter. Of all his works nothing remains but three books upon muſic, the moſt ancient on that ſubject extant.——A philoſopher of Cyrene. Athen.——A phyſician whoſe writings are quoted by Galen.——A poet of Selinus.——A Pythagorean philoſopher.

Aristus, a Greek hiſtorian of Salamis, who wrote an account of Alexander's expedition. Strab. 14.—Arrian. 7.

Aristyllus, an obſcure poet. Ariſtoph.——An aſtronomer of Alexandria, 292 B. C.

Arius, a river of Gaul, and of Aſia. The inhabitants in the neighbourhood are called Arii.——A celebrated writer, the origin of the Arian controverſy, that denied the eternal divinity and conſubſtantiality of the word. Though he was greatly perſecuted for his opinions, he gained the favor of the emperor Conſtantine, and triumphed over his powerful antagoniſt Athanaſius. He died the very night he was going to enter the church of Conſtantinople in triumph; preſſed by nature, he ſtepped aſide to eaſe himſelf; but his bowels guſhed out, and he expired on the ſpot. Athanaſ.

Armĕnes, a ſon of Nabis, led in triumph at Rome. Liv. 34, c. 1.

Armenia, a large country of Aſia, divided into Upper and Lower Armenia. Upper Armenia, called alſo Major, has Media on the eaſt, Iberia on the north, and Meſopotamia on the ſouth. Lower Armenia, or Minor, is bounded by Cappadocia, Armenia Major, Syria, Cilicia, and the Euphrates. The Armenians were a long time under the dominion of the Medes and Perſians, till they were conquered, with the reſt of Aſia, by Alexander and his ſucceſſors. The Romans made it one of their provinces, and, under ſome of the emperors, the Armenians had the privilege of chooſing their own kings, but they were afterwards reduced. The country received its name from Armenus, who was one of the Argonauts, and of Theſſalian origin. They borrowed the names and attributes of their deities from the Perſians. They paid uncommon adoration to Venus Anaitis, and the chiefeſt of the people always proſtituted their daughters in honor of this goddeſs. Armenia Major is now called Turconia, and Minor, Aladulia. Herodot. 1, c. 194. l. 5, c. 49.—Curt. 4, c. 12. l. 5, c. 1.—Strab. 1 & 11.—Mela. 3, &c.—Plin. 6, c. 4, &c.—Lucan. 2.

Armentarius, a Cæſar in Dioclefian's reign.

Armillatus, one of Domitian's favorites. Juv. 4, v. 53.

Armilustrium, a feſtival at Rome on the 19th of October. When the ſacrifices were offered, all the people appeared under arms. The feſtival has often been confounded with that of the Salii, though eaſily diſtinguiſhed; becauſe the latter was obſerved the 2d of March, and on the celebration of the Armiluſtrium they always played on a flute, and the Salii played upon the trumpet. It was inſtituted A. U. C. 543. Varro de L. L. 5, c. 3.—Liv. 27, c. 37.

Arminius, a warlike general of the Germans, who ſupported a bloody war againſt Rome for ſome time, and was at laſt conquered by Germanicus in two great battles. He was poiſoned by one of his friends, A. D. 19, in the 37th year of his age. Dio. 56.—Tacit. An. 1, &c.

Armoricæ, cities of Celtic Gaul, famous for the warlike, rebellious, and inconſtant diſpoſition of the inhabitants called Armorici. Cæſ. bell. G.

Arne, a city of Lycia, called afterwards Xanthus.——A town of Umbria in Italy.——A daughter of Æolus, who gave her name to two towns, one in Theſſaly, the other in Bœotia. Neptune changed himſelf into a bull to enjoy her company. Strab. 1 & 2.—Pauſ. 9, c. 40.—Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 4.

Arni, a people of Italy, deſtroyed by Hercules.

Arniensis, a tribe in Rome. Liv. 6.

Arnobius, a philoſopher in Dioclefian's reign, who became a convert to Chriſtianity. He applied for ordination, but was refuſed by the biſhops till he gave them a proof of his ſincerity. Upon this he wrote his celebrated treatiſe, in which he expoſes the abſurdity of irreligion, and ridicules their gods. Opinions are various concerning the purity of his ſtile, though all agree in praiſe of his extenſive erudition. The book that he wrote de rhetorica inſtitutione is not extant. The beſt edition of his treatiſe adverſus gentes is the 4to, printed L. Bat. 1651.

Arnus, a river of Etruria, riſing on the Appennine mountains, and falling into the Mediterranean. Liv. 22, c. 2.

Aroa, a town of Achaia. Pauſ. 7.

Aroma, a town of Caria——of Cappadocia.

Arpani, a people of Italy.

Arpi, a city of Apulia, built by Diomedes after the Trojan war. Juſtin. 20, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 10, v. 28.

Arpinum, a town of the Volſci, famous for giving birth to Cicero and Marius. Juv. 8, v. 237.——A town of Magna Græcia.

Arræi, a people of Thrace. Plin.

Arrhabæus, the king of a nation in the neighbourhood of Macedonia, who greatly diſtreſſed Archelaus. Ariſtot. 5. Polit. c. 10.

Arria. Vid. Aria.

Arria Galla, a beautiful, but immodeſt woman in the reign of the emperors. Tacit. 15, c. 59.

Arrianus, a philoſopher of Nicomedia, prieſt of Ceres and Proſerpine, and diſciple of Epictetus, called another Xenophon from the elegance and ſweetneſs of his diction, and diſtinguiſhed for his acquaintance with military and political life. He wrote 7 books of Alexander's expedition, the periplus of the Euxine and Red Sea, 4 books on the diſſertations of Epictetus, beſides an account of the Alani Bithynians and Parthians. He floriſhed about the 140th year of Chriſt, and was rewarded with the conſulſhip and government of Cappadocia, by M. Antoninus. The beſt edition of Arrian's Expeditio Alexandri, is the fol. Gronovii, L. Bat 1704, and the 8vo. a Raphelio, 2 vols. 1757, and the Tactica, 8vo. Amſt. 1683.——A Greek hiſtorian.——An Athenian who wrote a treatiſe on hunting, and the manner of keeping dogs.——A poet who wrote an epic poem in 24 books on Alexander; alſo another poem on Attalus, king of Pergamus. He likewiſe tranſlated Virgil's Georgics into greek verſe.

Arrius, a friend of Cicero, whoſe ſumptuous feaſt Horat. deſcribes, 2 ſat. 3, v. 86.——Aper, a Roman general who murdered the emperor, &c.

Arrius & Arius, a philoſopher of Alexandria, who ſo ingratiated himſelf with Auguſtus, after the battle of Actium, that the conqueror declared the people of Alexandria owed the preſervation of their city to theſe three cauſes; becauſe Alexander was their founder, becauſe of the beauty of the ſituation, and becauſe Arrius was a native of the place. Plut. in Anton.

Arruntius, a Roman conſul.——A famous geographer, who, upon being accuſed of adultery and treaſon, under Tiberius, opened his veins. Tacit. Ann. 6.

Arsabis,

Arsabes, a ſatrap of Armenia.—Of Perſia. Polyæn.

Arsăces, a man of obſcure origin, who upon ſeeing Seleucus defeated by the Gauls, invaded Parthia, and conquered the governor of the province called Andragoras, and laid the foundations of an empire, 250 B. C. He added the kingdom of the Hyrcani to his newly acquired poſſeſſions, and ſpent his time in eſtabliſhing his power, and regulating the laws. After death he was made a god of his nation, and all his ſucceſſors were called, in honor of his name, Arſacidæ. Juſtin. 41, c. 5 & 6.——His ſon and ſucceſſor bore the ſame name. He carried war againſt Antiochus the ſon of Seleucus, who entered the field with 100,000 foot and 20,000 horſe. He afterwards made peace with Antiochus, and died B. C. 217. Id. 41, c. 5.——The 3d king of Parthia, of the family of the Arſacidæ, bore the ſame name, and was alſo called Priapatius. He reigned 12 years, and left two ſons, Mithridates and Phraates. Phraates ſucceeded as being the elder, and at his death he left his kingdom to his brother, though he had many children; obſerving, that a monarch ought to have in view, not the dignity of his family, but the proſperity of his ſubjects. Juſtin. 31, c. 5.——A king of Pontus and Armenia, in alliance with the Romans. He fought long with ſucceſs againſt the Perſians, till he was deceived by the ſnares of king Sapor, his enemy, who put out his eyes, and ſoon deprived him of life. Marcellin.——The eldeſt ſon of Artabanus, appointed over Armenia by his father, after the death of king Artaxias. Tacit. Hiſt. 6. ——A ſervant of Themiſtocles.

Arsacĭdæ, a name given to ſome of the monarchs of Parthia, in honor of Arſaces, the founder of the empire. Their power ſubſiſted till the 229th year of the Chriſtian æra, when they were conquered by Artaxerxes king of Perſia.. Juſtin. 41.

Arsamĕnes, a ſatrap of Perſia, at the battle of the Granicus.

Arsametes, a river of Aſia, near Parthia. Tacit. ann. 15.

Arsamosāta, a town of Armenia Major, 70 miles from the Euphrates. Tacit. ann. 15.

Arsănes, the ſon of Ochus, and father of Codomanus.

Arsanias, a river of Armenia, which, according to ſome, flows into the Tigris, and afterwards into the Euphrates. Plin. 5, c. 24.

Arsites, a ſatrap of Paphlagonia.

Artabānus, ſon of Hyſtaſpes, was brother to Darius the firſt. He diſſuaded his nephew Xerxes from making war againſt the Greeks, and at his return he aſſaſſinated him with the hopes of aſcending the throne. Darius, the ſon of Xerxes, was murdered in a ſimilar manner; and Artaxerxes, his brother, would have ſhared the ſame fate, had not he diſcovered the ſnares of the aſſaſſin, and puniſhed him with death. Diod. 11.—Juſtin. 3, c. 1, &c.—Herodot. 4, c. 38. l. 7, c. 10, &c.——A king of Parthia, after the death of his nephew Phraates 2d. He undertook a war againſt a nation of Scythia, in which he periſhed. His ſon Mithridates ſucceeded him, and merited the appellation of Great. Juſtin. 42, c. 2.——A king of Media, and afterwards of Parthia, after the expulſion of Vonones, whom Tiberius had made king there. He invaded Armenia, from whence he was driven away by one of the generals of Tiberius. He was expelled from his throne, which Tiridates uſurped; and ſome time after, he was reſtored again to his antient power, and died A. D. 48. Tacit. ann. 5, &c.——A king of Parthia, very inimical to the intereſt of Veſpaſian.——Another king of Parthia, who made war againſt the emperor Caracalla, who had attempted his life on pretence of courting his daughter. He was murdered, and the power of Parthia aboliſhed, and the crown tranſlated to the Perſian monarchs. Dio.—Herodian.

ARTABĂZUS, a ſon of Pharnaces, general in the army of Xerxes. He fled from Greece upon the ill ſucceſs of Mardonius, Herodot. 7, 8 & 9.——A general who made war againſt Artaxerxes, and was defeated. He was afterwards reconciled to his prince, and became the familiar friend of Darius 3d. After the murder of this prince, he ſurrendered himſelf up with his ſons to Alexander, who treated him with much humanity and confidence. Curt. 5, c. 9 & 12. l. 6, c. 5. l. 7, c. 3 & 5. l. 8, c. 1.——An officer of Artaxerxes againſt Datames. Diod. 15.

ARTÆI, a name by which the Perſians were called among their neighbours. Herodot. 7, c. 61.

ARTAGERAS, a town of Upper Armenia. Strab.

ARTAGERSES, a general in the army of Artaxerxes, killed by Cyrus the younger. Plut. in Artax.

ARTANES, a king of the ſouthern parts of Armenia. Strab. 11.——A river of Thrace flowing into the Iſter. Herodot. 4, c. 49.——A river of Colchis.

ARTAPHERNES, a general whom Darius ſent into Greece with Datis. He was conquered at the battle of Marathon, by Miltiades. Vid. Datis. C. Nep. in Milt.—Herodot.

ARTATUS, a river of Illyria. Liv. 43, c. 19.

ARTAVASDES, a ſon of Tigranes king of Upper Armenia, who wrote tragedies, and ſhone as an elegant orator and faithful hiſtorian. He lived in alliance with the Romans, but Craſſus was defeated partly on account of his delay. He betrayed M. Antony in his expedition againſt Parthia, for which Antony reduced his kingdom, and carried him to Egypt, where he adorned the triumph of the conqueror led in golden chains. He was ſome time after murdered. Strab. 11.——The crown of Armenia was given by Tiberius to a perſon of the ſame name, who was expelled.—Auguſtus had alſo raiſed to the throne of Armenia, a perſon of the ſame name. Tacit. An. 2.

ARTAXA & ARTAXIAS, a general of Antiochus the Great, who erected the province of Armenia into a kingdom, by his reliance on the friendſhip of the Romans. King Tigranes was one of his ſucceſſors. Strab. 11.

ARTAXĂTA, a ſtrongly fortified town of Upper Armenia. The capital of the empire where the kings generally reſided. It is ſaid that Annibal built it for Artaxias, the king of the country. It was burnt by Corbulo, and rebuilt by Tiridates, who called it Neronea, in honor of Nero. Strab. 11.

ARTAXERXES 1ſt, ſucceeded to the kingdom of Perſia, after his father Xerxes. He deſtroyed Artabanus who had murdered Xerxes, and attempted to deſtroy the royal family to raiſe himſelf to the throne. He made war againſt the Bactrians, and re-conquered Egypt, that had revolted, with the aſſiſtance of the Athenians, and was remarkable for his equity and moderation. One of his hands was longer than the other, whence he has been called Macrochir or Longimanus. He reigned 39 years, and died B. C. 425. C. Nep. in Reg.—Plut. in Artax.——The 2d of that name, king of Perſia, was ſirnamed Mnemon, on account of his extenſive memory. He was ſon of Darius the ſecond, by Paryſatis, the daughter of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and had three brothers, Cyrus, Oſtanes, and Oxathres. His name was Arſaces, which he changed into Artaxerxes when he aſcended the throne. His brother Cyrus was of ſuch an ambitious diſpoſition, that he reſolved to make himſelf king, in oppoſition to Artaxerxes. Paryſatis always favored Cyrus; and when he had attempted tempted the life of Artaxerxes, ſhe obtained his pardon by her entreaties and influence. Cyrus, who had been appointed over Lydia and the ſea coaſts, aſſembled a large army under various pretences, and at laſt marched againſt his brother at the head of 100,000 Barbarians and 13,000 Greeks. He was oppoſed by Artaxerxes with 900,000 men, and a bloody battle was fought at Cunaxa, in which Cyrus was killed, and his forces routed. It has been reported, that Cyrus was killed by Artaxerxes, who was ſo deſirous of the honor, that he put to death two men for ſaying that they had killed him. The Greeks, who had aſſiſted Cyrus againſt his brother, though at the diſtance of above 600 leagues from their country, made their way through the territories of the enemy; and nothing is more famous in the Grecian hiſtory, than the retreat of the ten thouſand. After he was delivered from the factions of his brother, Artaxerxes ſtirred up a war among the Greeks againſt Sparta, and exerted all his influence to weaken the power of the Greeks. He married two of his own daughters, called Atoſſa and Ameſtris, and named his eldeſt ſon Darius to be ſucceſſor. Darius however conſpired againſt his father, and was put to death; and Ochus, one of the younger ſons, called alſo Artaxerxes, made his way to the throne, by cauſing his elder brothers Ariaſpes and Arſames to be aſſaſſinated. It is ſaid that Artaxerxes died of a broken heart, in conſequence of his ſon's unnatural behaviour, in the 94th year of his age, after a reign of 46 years, B. C. 358. Artaxerxes had 150 children by his 350 concubines, and only four legitimate ſons. Plut. in vitâ.—C. Nepos in Reg.—Juſtin. 10, c. 1, &c.—Diod. 13, &c.——The 3d, ſirnamed Ochus, ſucceeded his father Artaxerxes 2d, and eſtabliſhed himſelf on his throne by murdering above 80 of his neareſt relations. He puniſhed with death one of his officers who conſpired againſt him, and recovered Egypt, which had revolted, deſtroyed Sidon, and ravaged all Syria. He made war againſt the Caduſii, and greatly rewarded a private man called Codomanus for his uncommon valor. But his behavior in Egypt, his cruelty towards the inhabitants, offended his ſubjects, and Bagoas at laſt obliged his phyſician to poiſon him, B. C. 337, and afterwards gave his fleſh to be devoured by cats, and made handles for ſwords with his bones. Codomanus, on account of his virtues, was ſoon after made king by the people; and that he might ſeem to poſſeſs as much dignity as the houſe of Artaxerxes, he reigned under the name of Darius the 3d. Juſtin. 10, c. 3.—Diod. 17.—Ælian. V. H. 6, c. 8.

ARTAXERXES or ARTAXARES 1ſt, a common ſoldier of Perſia, who killed Artabanus, A. D. 228, and erected Perſia again into a kingdom, which had been extinct ſince the death of Darius. Severus the Roman emperor conquered him, and obliged him to remain within his kingdom. Herodian. 5.—— One of his ſucceſſors, ſon of Sapor, bore his name, and reigned 11 years, during which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his cruelties.

ARTAXIAS, ſon of Artavaſdes, king of Armenia, proclaimed king by his father's troops. He oppoſed Antony, by whom he was defeated, and became ſo odious that the Romans, at the requeſt of the Armenians, raiſed Tigranes to the throne.——Another, ſon of Polemon, whoſe original name was Zeno. After the expulſion of Venones from Armenia, he was made king by Germanicus. Tacit. 6. Ann. c. 31.——A general of Antiochus. Vid. Artaxa.

ARTAYCTES, a Perſian appointed governor of Seſtos by Xerxes. He was hung on a croſs by the Athenians for his cruelties. Herodot. 7 & 9.

ARTAYNTA, a Perſian lady, whom Xerxes gave in marriage to his ſon Darius. She was one of the miſtreſſes of her father-in-law. Herodot. 9, c. 103, &c.

ARTAYNTES, a Perſian appointed over a fleet in Greece, by Xerxes. Herodot. 8, c. 13. l. 9, c. 107.

ARTEMBARES, a celebrated Mede in the reign of Cyrus the Great. Herodot. 1 & 9.

ARTEMIDŌRUS, a native of Epheſus, who wrote an hiſtory and deſcription of the earth, in eleven books. He floriſhed about 104 years B. C.——A phyſician in the age of Adrian.——A man in the reign of Antoninus, who wrote a learned work on the interpretation of dreams, ſtill extant; the beſt edition of which is that of Rigaltius Paris, 4to. 1604, to which is annexed Achmetis oneirocritica.——A man of Cnidus, ſon to the hiſtorian Theopompus. He had a ſchool at Rome, and he wrote a book on illuſtrious men, not extant. As he was a friend of J. Cæſar, he wrote down an account of the conſpiracy which was formed againſt him. He gave it to the dictator from among the crowd as he was going to the ſenate, but J. Cæſar put it with other papers he held in his hand, thinking it to be of no material conſequence. Plut. in Cæſ.

ARTĔMIS, the Greek name of Diana. Her feſtivals, called Artemiſia, were celebrated in ſeveral parts of Greece, particularly at Delphi, where they offered to the goddeſs a mullet, which, as was ſuppoſed, bore ſome affinity to the goddeſs of hunting, becauſe it is ſaid to hunt and kill the ſea hare. There was a ſolemnity of the ſame name at Syracuſe; it laſted three days, which were ſpent in banqueting and diverſions. Athen. 7.

ARTEMISIA, daughter of Lygdamis of Halicarnaſſus, reigned over Halicarnaſſus and the neighbouring country. She aſſiſted Xerxes in his expedition againſt Greece with a fleet, and her valor was ſo great that the monarch obſerved, that all his men fought like women, and all his women like men. The Athenians were ſo aſhamed of fighting againſt a woman, that they offered a reward of 10,000 drachms for her head. It is ſaid that ſhe was fond of a youth of Abydos, called Dardanus, and that, to puniſh his diſdain, ſhe put out his eyes while he was aſleep, and afterwards leaped down the promontory of Leucas. Herodot. 7, c. 99. l. 8, c. 68, &c.—Juſtin. 2, c. 12.——There was alſo another queen of Caria of that name, often confounded with the daughter of Lygdamis. She was daughter of Hecatomnus king of Caria or Halicarnaſſus, and was married to her own brother Mauſolus, famous for his perſonal beauty. She was ſo fond of her huſband, that at his death ſhe drank in her liquor his aſhes, after his body had been burned, and erected to his memory a monument, which, for its grandeur and magnificence, was called one of the ſeven wonders of the world. This monument ſhe called Mauſoleum, a name which has been given from that time to all monuments of uncommon ſplendor. She invited all the literary men of her age, and propoſed rewards to him who compoſed the beſt elegiac panegyric upon her huſband. The prize was adjudged to Theopompus. Asia, one of the three parts of the ancient world, separated from Europe by the Tanais, the Euxine, Ægean, and Mediterranean seas. The Nile and Egypt divide it from Africa. It receives its name from Asia, the daughter of Oceanus. This part of the globe has given birth to many of the greatest monarchies of the universe, and to the ancient inhabitants of Asia we are indebted for most of the arts and sciences. The soil is fruitful, and abounds with all the necessaries as well as luxuries of life. It was divided into many different empires, provinces, and states, of which the most conspicuous were the Assyrian and Persian monarchies. The Assyrian monarchy, according to Eusebius, lasted 1240 years, and according to Justin, 1300 years, down to the year of the world 4380. The empire of Persia existed 228 years, till the death of Darius the 3d, whom Alexander the Great conquered. The empire of the Medes lasted 259 years, according to Eusebius, or less, according to others, till the reign of Astyages, who was conquered by Cyrus the Great, who transferred the power of the Medes, and founded the Persian monarchy. It was in Asia that the military valor of the Macedonians, and the bold retreat of the 10,000 Greeks, were so conspicuously displayed. It is in that part of the world that we are to look for the more visible progress of luxury, despotism, sedition, effeminacy, and dissipation. Asia was generally divided into Major and Minor. Asia Major was the most extensive, and comprehended all the eastern parts; and Asia Minor was a large country in the form of a peninsula, whose boundaries may be known by drawing a line from the bay of Issus, in a northern direction, to the eastern part of the Euxine sea. Asia Minor has been subject to many revolutions. It was tributary to the Scythians for upwards of 1500 years, and was a long time in the power of the Lydians, Medes, &c. The western parts of Asia Minor were the receptacle of all the ancient emigrations from Greece, and it was totally peopled by Grecian colonies. The Romans generally and indiscriminately called Asia Minor by the name of Asia. Strab.—Mela—Justin.—Plin.—Tacit. &c.——One of the Oceanides, who married Japetus, and gave her name to one of the three quarters of the ancient globe. Apollod. 1, c. 2.——One of the Nereides. Hygin.——A mountain of Laconia. Paus. 3, c. 24.

ASTER, a dexterous archer of Amphipolis, who offered his ſervices to Philip king of Macedonia. Upon being ſlighted, he retired into the city, and aimed an arrow at Philip, who preſſed it with a ſiege. The arrow, on which was written, "aimed at Philip's right eye," ſtruck the king's eye, and put it out; and Philip, to return the pleaſantry, threw back the ſame arrow, with theſe words, "If Philip takes the town, After ſhall be hanged." The conqueror kept his word. Lucian. de Hiſt. Scrib.

ASTĔRIA, a daughter of Ceus, one of the Titans, by Phœbe, daughter of Cœlus and Terra. She married Perſes, ſon of Crius, by whom ſhe had the celebrated Hecate. She enjoyed for a long time the favors of Jupiter, under the form of an eagle; but falling under his diſpleaſure, ſhe was changed into a quail, called ortyx by the Greeks; whence the name of Ortygia, given to that iſland in the Archipelago, where ſhe retired. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 4.—Hygin. fab. 58.—Apollod. 1, c. 2, &c.——A town of Greece, whoſe inhabitants went to the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2, v. 735.——One of the daughters of Danaus, who married Chætus, ſon of Ægyptus. Apollod. 2.——One of the daughters of Atlas, mother of Oenomaus, king of Piſa. Hygin. fab. 250.——A miſtreſs of Gyges, to whom Horace wrote three odes, to comfort her during her lover's abſence.

ASTĔRION & ASTĔRIUS, a river of Peloponneſus, which flowed through the country of Argolis. This river had three daughters, Eubœa, Proſymna, and Acræa, Pauſ. 2, c. 17.——A ſon of Cometes, who was one of the Argonauts. Apollon. 1.——A ſtatuary, ſon of Æſchylus. Pauſ.——A ſon of Minos 2d, king of Crete, by Paſiphae. He was killed by Theſeus, though he was thought the ſtrongeſt of his age. Apollodorus ſuppoſes him to be the ſame as the famous Minotaur. According to ſome, Aſterion was ſon of Teutamus, one of the deſcendants of Æolus, and they ſay that he was ſirnamed Jupiter, becauſe he had carried away Europa, by whom he had Minos the 1ſt. Diod. 4.—Apollod. 3.—Pauſ. 2, c. 31.——A ſon of Neleus and Chloris. Apollod. 1, c. 12.

ASTERODIA, the wife of Endymion. Pauſ. 5, c. 1.

ASTERŎPE & ASTEROPEA, one of the Pleiades, who were beloved by the gods and moſt illuſtrious heroes, and made conſtellations after death.——A daughter of Pelias, king of Iolchos, who aſſiſted her ſiſters to kill her father, whom Medea promiſed to reſtore to life. Her grave was ſeen in Arcadia, in the time of Pauſanias, 8, c. 11.——A daughter of Deion by Diomede. Apollod. 1.——The wife of Æſacus. Id. 3.

ASTEROPÆUS, a king of Pæonia, ſon of Pelegon. He aſſiſted Priam in the Trojan war, and was killed by Achilles. Homer. Il. 17, &c.

ASTERŪSIUS, a mountain at the ſouth of Crete.——A town of Arabia Felix.

ASTINŎME, the wife of Hipponous.

ASTIŎCHUS, a general of Lacedæmon, who conquered the Athenians near Cnidus, and took Phocæa and Cumæ, B. C. 411.

ASTRÆA, a daughter of Aſtræus, king of Arcadia, or, according to others, of Titan, Saturn's brother by Aurora. Some make her daughter of Jupiter and Themis. She was called Juſtice, of which virtue ſhe was the goddeſs. She lived upon the earth, as the poets mention, during the golden age; but the wickedneſs and impiety of mankind drove her to heaven in the brazen and iron ages, and ſhe was placed among the conſtellations of the zodiac, under the name of Virgo. She is repreſented as a virgin, with a ſtern, but majeſtic countenance, holding a pair of ſcales in one hand, and a ſword in the other. Senec. in Octav.—Ovid. Met. 1. v. 149.—Arat. 1. Phænom. v. 98.—Heſiod. Theog.

ASTRÆUS, one of the Titans who made war againſt Jupiter.——A river of Macedonia, near Thermæ. Ælian. H. V. 15, c. 2.

ASTU, a Greek word which ſignifies city, generally applied, by way of diſtinction, to Athens, which was the moſt capital city of Greece. The word urbs is applied with the ſame meaning of ſuperiority to Rome, and πτολις to Alexandria, the capital of Egypt.

ASTUR, an Etrurian, who aſſiſted Æneas againſt Turnus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 180.

ASTŬRES, a people of Hiſpania Tarraconenſis, who ſpend all their lives in digging for mines of ore. Lucan. 4, v. 298.—Ital. 1, v. 231.

ASTYĂGE, a daughter of Ipheus, who married Periphas, by whom ſhe had ſome children, among whom was Antion, the father of Ixion.

ASTYĂGES, ſon of Cyaxares, was the laſt king of Media. He was father to Mandane, whom he gave in marriage to Cambyſes, an ignoble perſon of Perſia, becauſe he was told by a dream, that his daughter's ſon would diſpoſſeſs him of his crown. From ſuch a marriage he hoped that none but mean and ignorant children could be raiſed; but he was diſappointed, and though he had expoſed his daughter's ſon by the effects of a ſecond dream, he was deprived of his crown by his grandſon, after a reign of 35 years. Aſtyages was very cruel and oppreſſive; and Harpagus, one of his officers, whoſe ſon he had wantonly murdered, encouraged Mandane's ſon, who was called Cyrus, to take up arms againſt his grandfather, and he conquered him and took him priſoner, 559 B. C. Xenophon, in his Cyropædia, relates a different ſtory, and aſſerts that Cyrus and he lived in the moſt undiſturbed friendſhip together. Juſtin. 1, c. 4, &c.—Herodot. 1, c. 74, 75, &c.——A grammarian who wrote a commentary on Callimachus.——A man changed into a ſtone by Meduſa's head. Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 6.

ASTYĂLUS, a Trojan killed by Neoptolemus. Homer. Il. 6.

ASTYĂNAX, a ſon of Hector and Andromache. He was very young when the Greeks beſieged Troy; and when the city was taken, his mother ſaved him in her arms from the flames. Ulyſſes, who was afraid leſt the young prince ſhould inherit the virtues of his father, and one day avenge the ruin of his country upon the Greeks, ſeized him, and threw him down from the walls of Troy. According to Euripides, he was killed by Menelaus; and Seneca ſays, that Pyrrhus the ſon of Achilles put him to death. Hector had given him the name of Scamandrius; but the Trojans, who hoped he might prove as great as his father, called him Aſtyanax, or the bulwark of the city. Homer. Il. 6 & 22 ——Virg. Æn. 2, v. 457. l. 3, v. 489. —Ovid. Met. 13, v. 415.——An Arcadian, who had a ſtatue in the temple of Jupiter, on mount Lyceus. Pauſ. 8, c. 38.——A ſon of Hercules. Apollod. 2, c. 7.——A writer in the age of Gallienus.

ASTYCRATIA, a daughter of Æolus. Homer. Il.——A daughter of Amphion and Niobe.

ASTYDĂMAS, an Athenian, pupil to Iſocrates. He wrote 240 tragedies, of which only 15 obtained the poetical prize.——A Mileſian, three times victorious at Olympia. He was famous for his ſtrength, as well as for his voracious appetite. He was once invited to a feaſt by king Ariobarzanes, and he eat what had been prepared for nine perſons. Athen. 10.——Two tragic writers bore the ſame name, one of whom was diſciple to Socrates.——A comic poet of Athens.

ASTYDĂMIA, daughter of Amyntor, king of Orchomenos in Bœotia, married Acaſtus, ſon of Pelias, who was king of Iolchos. She became enamoured of Peleus, ſon of Æacus, who had viſited her huſband's court; and becauſe he refuſed to gratify her paſſion, ſhe accuſed him of attempting her virtue. Acaſtus readily believed his wife's accuſation; and as he would not violate the laws of hoſpitality, by puniſhing his gueſt with inſtant death, he waited for a favorable opportunity, and diſſembled his reſentment. At laſt they went in a hunting party to mount Pelion, where Peleus was tied to a tree, by order of Acaſtus, that he might be devoured by wild beaſts. Jupiter was moved at the innocence of Peleus, and ſent Vulcan to deliver him. When Peleus was ſet at liberty, he marched with an army againſt Acaſtus, whom he dethroned, and puniſhed with death the cruel and falſe Aſtydamia. She is called by ſome Hippolyte. Apollod. 3, c. 13.—Pindar. Nem. 4.——A daughter of Ormenus, carried away by Hercules, by whom ſhe had Tlepolemus. Ovid. Heroid. 9, v. 50.

Atăce, a town of Gaul, whence the adjective Atacinus.

Atalanta, a daughter of Schœneus, king of Scyros. According to ſome, ſhe was the daughter of Jaſus or Jaſius, by Clymene; but others ſay that Menalion was her father. This uncertainty of not rightly knowing the name of her father, has led the mythologiſts into error, and ſome have maintained that there were two perſons of that name, though their ſuppoſition is groundleſs. Atalanta was born in Arcadia, and, according to Ovid, ſhe determined to live in perpetual celibacy; but her beauty gained her many admirers, and to free herſelf from their importunities, ſhe propoſed to run a race with them. They were to run without arms, and ſhe was to carry a dart in her hand. Her lovers were to ſtart firſt, and whoever arrived at the goal before her, would be made her huſband; but all thoſe whom ſhe overtook, were to be killed by the dart with which ſhe had armed herſelf. As ſhe was almoſt invincible in running, many of her ſuitors periſhed in the attempt, till Hippomenes the ſon of Macareus propoſed himſelf as her admirer. Venus had preſented him with three golden apples from the garden of the Heſperides, or according to others, from an orchard in Cyprus; and as ſoon as he had ſtarted in the courſe, he artfully threw down the apples at ſome diſtance one from the other. While Atalanta, charmed at the ſight, ſtopped to gather the apples; Hippomenes haſtened on his courſe, arrived firſt at the goal, and obtained Atalanta in marriage. Theſe two fond lovers, in the impatience of conſummating their nuptials, entered the temple of Cybele; and the goddeſs was ſo offended at their impiety, and at the profanation of her houſe, that ſhe changed them into two lions. Apollodorus ſays, that Atalanta's father was deſirous of raiſing a male iſſue, and that therefore ſhe was expoſed to wild beaſts as ſoon as born. She was however ſuckled by a ſhe-bear, and preſerved by ſhepherds. She dedicated her time to hunting, and reſolved to live in celibacy. She killed two centaurs who attempted her virtue. She was preſent at the hunting of the Calydonian boar, which ſhe firſt wounded, and ſhe received the head as a preſent from Meleager, who was enamoured of her. She was alſo at the games inſtituted in honor of Pelias, where ſhe conquered Peleus; and when her father, to whom ſhe had been reſtored, wiſhed her to marry, ſhe conſented to give herſelf to him who could overcome her in running, as has been ſaid above. She had a ſon called Parthenopæus, by Hippomenes. Hyginus ſays, that that ſon was the fruit of her love with Meleager; and Apollodorus ſays ſhe had him by Milanion, or, according to others, by the god Mars. [Vid. Meleager.] Apollod. 1, c. 8. l. 3, c. 9, &c.—Pauſ. 1, c. 36, 45, &c.—Hygin. fab. 99, 174, 185, 270.—Ælian. V. H. 13.—Diod. 4.—*Ovid. ATHAMĂNES, an ancient people of Epirus, who exiſted long before the Trojan war, and ſtill preſerved their name and cuſtoms in the age of Alexander. There was a fountain in their territories, whoſe waters, about the laſt quarter of the moon, were ſo ſulphureous that they ſet on fire any piece of wood. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 311. —Strab. 7.—Plin. 2.—Mela. 2, c. 3.

ATHĂMAS, king of Thebes, in Bœotia, was ſon of Æolus. He married Themiſto, whom ſome call Nephele, and Pindar, Demotice, and by her he had Phryxus and Helle. Some time after, on pretence that Nephele was ſubject to fits of madneſs, he married Ino, the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he had two ſons, Learchus and Melicerta. Ino became jealous of the children of Nephele; becauſe they were to aſcend their father's throne in preference to her own, therefore ſhe reſolved to deſtroy them; but they eſcaped from her fury to Colchis, on a golden ram. [Vid. Phryxus & Argonautæ.] According to the Greek ſcholiaſt of Lycophron, v. 22. Ino attempted to deſtroy the corn of the country; and as if it were the conſequence of divine vengeance, the ſoothſayer, at her inſtigation, told Athamas, that before the earth would yield her uſual increaſe, he muſt ſacrifice one of the children of Nephele to the gods. The credulous father led Phryxus to the altar, where he was ſaved by Nephele. The proſperity of Ino was diſpleaſing to Juno, and more particularly becauſe ſhe was deſcended from Venus. The goddeſs therefore ſent Tiſiphone, one of the furies, to the houſe of Athamas, who became inflamed with ſuch ſudden fury, that he took Ino to be a lioneſs, and her two children to be whelps. In this fit of madneſs he ſnatched Learchus from her, and killed him againſt a wall; upon which, Ino fled with Melicerta, and, with him in her arms, ſhe threw herſelf into the ſea from a high rock, and was changed into a ſea deity. After this, Athamas recovered the uſe of his ſenſes; and as he was without children, he adopted Coronus and Aliartus, the ſons of Therſander his nephew. Hygin. fab. 1, 2. 5, 239.—Apollod. 1, c. 7 & 9.—*Ovid. ATHAMANTIĂDES, a patronymic of Melicerta, Phryxus, or Helle, children of Athamas. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 919.

ATHANASIUS, a biſhop of Alexandria, celebrated for his ſufferings, and the determined oppoſition he maintained againſt Arius and his doctrine. His writings, which were numerous, and ſome of which have periſhed, contain a defence of the myſtery of the Trinity, the divinity of the word and of the Holy Ghoſt, and an apology to Conſtantine. The creed which bears his name, is ſuppoſed by ſome not to be his compoſition. Athanaſius died 2d May, 373 A. D. after filling the archiepiſcopal chair 47 years, and leading alternately a life of exile and of triumph. The lateſt edition of his works, is that of Benedictin. 3 vols. fol. Paris, 1698.

ATHĒNA, the name of Minerva among the Greeks.

ATHĒNÆ, a celebrated city of Attica, founded about 1556 years before the Chriſtian era, by Cecrops and an Egyptian colony. It was called Cecropia from its founder, and afterwards Athenæ in honor of Minerva, who had obtained the right of giving it a name in preference to Neptune. [Vid. Minerva.] It was governed by 17 kings, in the following order:—After a reign of 50 years, Cecrops was ſucceeded by Cranaus, who began to reign 1506 B. C. Amphictyon, 1497; Erichthonius, 1487; Pandion, 1437; Erichtheus, 1397; Cecrops 2d, 1347; Pandion, Pandion 2d, 1307; Ægeus, 1283; Theſeus, 1235; Meneſtheus, 1205; Demophoon, 1282; Oxyntes, 1149; Aphidas, 1137; Thymœtes, 1336; Melanthus, 1128; and Codrus, 1091, who was killed after a reign of 21 years. The hiſtory of the twelve firſt of theſe monarchs, is moſtly fabulous. After the death of Codrus, the monarchical power was aboliſhed, and the ſtate was governed by 13 perpetual, and, 317 years after, by 7 decennial, and laſtly, B. C. 684, after an anarchy of 3 years, by annual magiſtrates, called Archons. (Vid. Archontes.) Under this democracy, the Athenians ſignalized themſelves by their valor in the field, and their munificence, and the cultivation of the fine arts. They were deemed ſo powerful by the Perſians, that Xerxes, when he invaded Greece, chiefly directed his arms againſt Athens, which he took and burnt. Their military character was chiefly diſplayed in the battles of Marathon, of Salamis, of Platæa, and of Mycale, After theſe immortal victories, they roſe in conſequence and dignity, and they demanded the ſuperiority in the affairs of Greece. The town was re-built and embelliſhed by Themiſtocles, and a new and magnificent harbour built. Their ſucceſs made them arrogant, and they raiſed contentions among the neighbouring ſtates, that they might aggrandize themſelves by their fall. The luxury and intemperance, which had been long excluded from the city by the ſalutary laws of their countrymen, Draco and Solon, creeped by degrees among all ranks of people, and ſoon all Greece united to deſtroy that city, which claimed a ſovereign power over all the reſt. The Peloponneſian war, though at firſt a private quarrel, was ſoon fomented into an univerſal war; and the arms of all the ſtates of Peloponneſus (Vid. Peloponneſiacum bellum.) were directed againſt Athens, which, after 28 years of miſfortunes and bloodſhed, was totally ruined, the 24th April, 404 years before the Chriſtian era, by Lyſander. After this, the Athenians were oppreſſed by 30 tyrants, and for a while labored under the weight of their own calamities. They recovered ſomething of their uſual ſpirit in the age of Philip, and boldly oppoſed his ambitious views; but their efforts were not of great ſervice to the intereſt of Greece. They fell into the hands of the Romans, B. C. 86. The Athenians have been admired in all ages, for their love of liberty, and for the great men that were born among them; but favor there, was attended with danger; and there are very few inſtances in the hiſtory of Athens, that can prove that the jealouſy and frenzy of the people did not perſecute and diſturb the peace of the man who has fought their battles, and expoſed his life in the defence of his country. Perhaps, not one ſingle city in the world can boaſt in ſuch a ſhort ſpace of time, of ſuch a number of truly illuſtrious citizens, equally celebrated for their humanity, their learning, and their military abilities. The Romans, in the more poliſhed ages of their republic, ſent their youths to finiſh their education at Athens, and reſpected the learning, while they deſpiſed the military character of the inhabitants. The reputation the Athenian ſchools had acquired under Socrates and Plato, was maintained by their degenerate and leſs learned ſucceſſors; and they floriſhed with diminiſhed luſtre, till an edict of the emperor Juſtinian ſuppreſſed, with the Roman conſulſhip, the philoſophical meetings of the academy. It has been ſaid by Plutarch, that the good men which Athens produced, were the moſt juſt and equitable in the world; but that its bad citizens could not be ſurpaſſed in any age or country, for their impiety, perfidiouſneſs, or cruelties. Their criminals were always put to death by drinking the juice of hemlock. The ancients, to diſtinguiſh Athens in a more peculiar manner, called it Aſtu, one of the eyes of Greece, the learned city, the ſchool of the world, the common patroneſs of Greece. The Athenians thought themſelves the moſt ancient nation of Greece, and ſuppoſed themſelves the original inhabitants of Attica, for which reaſon they were called αυτοχθονες, produced from the ſame earth which they inhabited, γηγενεις ſons of the earth, and τεττιγες graſshoppers. They ſometimes wore golden graſhoppers in their hair as badges of honor, to diſtinguiſh them from other people of later origin and leſs noble extraction, becauſe thoſe inſects are ſuppoſed to be ſprung from the ground. Cic. ad Attic. in Verr. &c.—Thucyd. 1, &c.—Juſtin. 2, &c.—Diod. 13, *&c.—Ælian. ATHENÆA, feſtivals celebrated at Athens in honor of Minerva. One of them was called Panathenæa, and the other Chalcea; for an account of which ſee thoſe words.

ATHENÆUM, a place at Athens, ſacred to Minerva, where the poets, philoſophers, and rhetoricians generally declaimed and repeated their compoſitions. It was public to all the profeſſors of the liberal arts. The ſame thing was adopted at Rome by Adrian, who made a public building for the ſame laudable purpoſes.——A promontory of Italy.

ATHENÆUS, a Greek coſmographer.——A peripatetic philoſopher of Cilicia in the time of Auguſtus. Strab.——A Spartan ſent by his countrymen to Athens, to ſettle the peace during the Peloponneſian war. ——A grammarian of Naucratis, who compoſed an elegant and miſcellaneous work, called Deipnoſophiſtæ, replete with very curious and intereſting remarks and anecdotes of the manners of the ancients, and likewiſe valuable for the ſcattered pieces of ancient poetry it preſerves. The work conſiſts of 15 books, of which the two firſt, part of the third, and almoſt the whole of the laſt, are loſt. Athenæus wrote, beſides this, an hiſtory of Syria, and other works now loſt. He died A. D. 194. The beſt edition of his works is that of Cauſaubon, fol. 2 vols. Lugd. 1612, by far ſuperior to the editions of 1595 and 1657.——A hiſtorian, who wrote an account of Semiramis. Diod.——A brother of king Eumenes 2d, famous for his paternal affection.——A Roman general, in the age of Gallienus, who is ſuppoſed to have written a book on military engines.——A phyſician of Cilicia in the age of Pliny, who made heat, cold, wet, dry, and air, the elements, inſtead of the four commonly received.

ATHENAGŌRAS, a Greek in the time of Darius, to whom Pharnabazus gave the government of Chios, &c. Curt. 8, c. 5. ——A writer on agriculture. Varro.—— A Chriſtian philoſopher, in the age of Aurelius, who wrote a treatiſe on the reſurrection, and an apology for the chriſtians, ſtill extant. He died A. D. 177. The beſt edition of his works is that of Dechair, 8vo. Oxon, 1706.——The romance of Theagenes and Charis is falſely aſcribed to him.

ATHENAIS, a Sibyl of Erythræa, in the age of Alexander. Strab.——A daughter of the philoſopher Leontius.

ATHENION, a peripatetic philoſopher, 108 B. C.——A general of the Sicilian ſlaves.——A tyrant of Athens, ſirnamed Ariſtion.

ATHENŌCLES, a general, &c. Polyæn. 6.——A turner of Mitylene. Plin. 34.

ATHENODŌRUS, a philoſopher of Tarſus, intimate with Auguſtus. The emperor often profited by his leſſons, and was adviſed by him always to repeat the 24 letters of the Greek alphabet, before he gave way to the impulſe of anger. Athenodorus died in his 82d year, much lamented by his countrymen. Suet.——A poet who wrote comedy, tragedy, and elegy, in the age of Alexander. Plut. in Alex.——A ſtoic philoſopher of Cana, near Tarſus, in the age of Auguſtus. He was intimate with Strabo. Strab. 14.——A philoſopher, diſciple to Zeno, and keeper of the royal library at Pergamus.——A marble ſculptor.——A man aſſaſſinated at Bactra for making himſelf abſolute.

ATHEOS, a ſirname of Diagoras and Theodorus, becauſe they denied the exiſtence of a deity. Cic. de Nat. D. 1, c. 1.

ATHESIS, a river of Ciſalpine Gaul, near the Po, falling into the Adriatic ſea. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 680.

ATHOS, a mountain of Macedonia, projecting into the Ægean ſea like a promontory. It is ſo high that it overſhadows the iſland of Lemnos, though at the diſtance of 87 miles; or, according to modern calculation, only eight leagues. When Xerxes invaded Greece, he made a trench of a mile and a half in length at the foot of the mountain, into which he brought the ſea-water, and conveyed his fleet over it.—A ſculptor, called Denocrates, offered Alexander to cut mount Athos, and make with it a ſtatue of the king holding a town in his left hand, and in the right a ſpacious baſon, to receive all the waters which flowed from it. Alexander greatly admired the plan, but objected to the place; and he obſerved, that the neighbouring country was not ſufficiently fruitful to produce corn and proviſions for the inhabitants which were to dwell in the city, in the hand of the ſtatue. Athos is now called Monte Santo. Herodot. 6, c. 44. l. 7, c. 21, &c.—Lucan. 2, v. 672.—Ælian. de Anim. 13, c. 20, &c. —Plin. 4, c. 10.—Æſchin. contra Cteſiph.

ATHYMBRA, a city of Caria, afterwards called Nyſſa. Strab. 14.

ATIA, a city of Campania.——A law enacted A. U. C. 690, by T. Atius Labienus, the tribune of the people. It aboliſhed the Cornelian law, and put in full force the Lex Domitia, by transferring the right of electing prieſts from the college of prieſts to the people.——The mother of Auguſtus. Vid. Accia.

ATILIA LEX gave the pretor and a majority of the tribunes, power of appointing guardians to thoſe minors who were not previouſly provided for by their parents. It was enacted about A. U. C. 560.—— Another A. U. C. 443, which gave the people power of electing 20 tribunes of the ſoldiers in four legions. Liv. 9, c. 30.

ATILIUS, a freed man, who exhibited combats of gladiators at Fidenæ. The amphitheatre, which contained the ſpectators, fell during the exhibition, and about 50,000 perſons were killed or mutilated. Tacit. 4, Ann. c. 62.

ATILLA, the mother of the poet Lucan. She was accuſed of conſpiracy by her ſon, who expected to clear himſelf of the charge. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 56.

ATINA, an antient town of the Volſci, one of the firſt that began hoſtilities againſt Æneas. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 630.

ATINAS, a friend of Turnus, &c. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 869.

ATINIA LEX, was enacted by the tribune Atinius. It gave a tribune of the people the privileges of a ſenator, and the right of ſitting in the ſenate.

ATLANTES, a people of Africa in the neighbourhood of mount Atlas. They daily curſed the ſun at his riſing and at his ſetting, becauſe his exceſſive heat ſcorched and tormented them. Herodot.

ATLANTIADES, a patronymic of Mercury, as grandſon of Atlas. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 639.

ATLANTĬDES, a people of Africa, near mount Atlas. They boaſted of being in poſſeſſion of the country in which all the gods of antiquity received their birth. Uranus was their firſt king, whom, on account of his knowledge of aſtronomy, they enrolled in the number of their gods. Diod. 3.——The daughters of Atlas, ſeven in number, Maia, Electra, Taygeta, Aſterope, Merope, Alcyone and Celæno. They married ſome of the gods, and moſt illuſtrious heroes, and their children were founders of many nations and cities. The Atlantides were called nymphs, and even goddeſſes on account of their great intelligence and knowledge. The name of Heſperides was alſo given them, on account of their mother Heſperis. They were made conſtellations after death. Vid. Pleiades.

ATLAS, one of the Titans, ſon of Japetus and Clymene, one of the Oceanides. He was brother to Epimetheus, Prometheus and Menœtius. His mother's name, according to Apollodorus, was Aſia. He married Pleione, daughter of Oceanus or Heſperis, according to others, by whom he had ſeven daughters, called Atlantides. (Vid. Atlantides.) He was king of Mauritania, and maſter of a thouſand flocks of every kind, as alſo of beautiful gardens, abounding in every ſpecies of fruit, which he had entruſted to the care of a dragon. Perſeus, after the conqueſt of the Gorgons, paſſed by the palace of Atlas, and demanded hoſpitality. The king, who was informed by an oracle of Themis that he ſhould be dethroned by one of the deſcendants of Jupiter, refuſed to receive him, and even offered him violence. Perſeus, who was unequal in ſtrength, ſhewed him Meduſa's head, and Atlas was inſtantly changed into a large mountain. This mountain, which runs acroſs the deſarts of Africa eaſt to weſt, is ſo high that the ancients have imagined that the heavens reſted on its top, and that Atlas ſupported the world on his ſhoulders. Hyginus ſays, that Atlas aſſiſted the giants in their wars againſt the gods, for which Jupiter compelled him to bear the heavens on his ſhoulders. The fable that Atlas ſupported the heavens on his back, ariſes from his fondneſs for aſtronomy, and his often frequenting elevated places and mountains, whence he might obſerve the heavenly bodies. The daughters of Atlas were carried away by Buſiris king of Egypt, but redeemed by Hercules, who received as a reward from the father, the knowledge of aſtronomy, and a celeſtial globe. This knowledge Hercules communicated to the Greeks; whence the fable has further ſaid, that he eaſed for ſome time the labors of Atlas, by taking upon his ſhoulders the weight of the heavens. According to ſome authors, there were two other perſons of that name, a king of Italy, father of Electra, and a king of Arcadia, father of Maia the mother of Mercury. *Virg. ATOSSA, a daughter of Cyrus, who was one of the wives of Cambyſes, Smerdis, and afterwards of Darius, by whom ſhe had Xerxes. She was cured of a dangerous cancer by Democedes. She is ſuppoſed by ſome to be the Vaſthi of ſcripture. Herodot. 3, c. 68, &c.

ATRĂCES, a people of Ætolia, who received their name from Atrax, ſon of Ætolus. Their country was called Atracia.

ATRAMYTTIUM, a town of Myſia.

ATRĂPES, an officer of Alexander, who, at the general diviſion of the provinces, received Media. Diod. 18.

ATRAX, a ſon of Ætolus, or, according to others, of the river Peneus. He was king of Theſſaly, and built a town which he called Atrax or Atracia. This town became ſo famous that the word Atracius has been applied to any inhabitant of Theſſaly. He was father to Hippodamia, who married Pirithous, and whom we muſt not confound with the wife of Pelops, who bore the ſame name. Propert. 1, el. 8, v. 25.—Stat. 1, Theb. v. 106.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 209.——A city of Theſſaly, whence the epithet of Atracius.——A river of Ætolia, which falls into the Ionian ſea.

ATREBĀTÆ, a people of Britain, who were in poſſeſſion of the modern counties of Berks, Oxford, &c.

ATRĔBĀTES, a people of Gaul, who oppoſed J. Cæſar with 15,000 men together with the Nervii. They were conquered, and Commius a friend of the general was ſet over them as king. They were reinſtated in their former liberty and independence, on account of the ſervices of Commius. Cæſ. bell. Gall. 2, &c.

ATRĒNI, a people of Armenia.

ATREUS, a ſon of Pelops by Hippodamia, daughter of Œnomaus king of Piſa, was king of Mycenæ, and brother to Pittheus, Troezen, Thyeſtes, and Chryſippus. As Chryſippus was an illegitimate ſon, and at the ſame time a favorite of his father, Hippodamia reſolved to remove him. She perſuaded her ſons Thyeſtes and Atreus to murder him; but their refuſal exaſperated her more, and ſhe executed it herſelf. This murder was grievous to Pelops; he ſuſpected his two ſons, who fled away from his preſence. Atreus retired to the court of Euryſtheus king of Argos, his nephew, and upon his death he ſucceeded him on the throne. He married, as ſome report, Ærope, his predeceſſor's daughter, by whom he had Pliſthenes, Menelaus and Agamemnon. Others affirm, that Ærope was the wife of Pliſthenes, by whom ſhe had Agamemnon and Menelaus, who are the reputed ſons of Atreus, becauſe that prince took care of their education, and brought them up as his own. (Vid. Pliſthenes.) Thyeſtes had followed his brother to Argos, where he lived with him, and debauched his wife, by whom he had ſome children. This inceſtuous commerce offended Atreus, and Thyeſtes was baniſhed from his court. He was however ſoon after recalled by his brother, who determined cruelly to revenge the violence offered to his bed. To effect this purpoſe, he invited his brother to a ſumptuous feaſt, where Thyeſtes was ſerved up with the fleſh of the children he had had by his ſiſter-in-law the queen. After the repaſt was finiſhed, the arms and the head of the murdered children were produced, to convince Thyeſtes of what he had feaſted upon. This action appeared ſo cruel and impious, that the ſun is ſaid to have ſhrunk back in his courſe at the bloody ſight. Thyeſtes immediately fled to the court of Theſprotus, and thence to Sicyon, where he raviſhed his own daughter Pelopea, in a grove ſacred to Minerva, without knowing who ſhe was. This inceſt he committed intentionally, as ſome report, to revenge himſelf on his brother Atreus, according to the word of the oracle, which promiſed him ſatisfaction for the cruelties he had ſuffered, only from the hand of a ſon who was born of himſelf and his own daughter. Pelopea brought forth a ſon whom ſhe called Ægiſthus, and and ſoon after ſhe married Atreus, who had loſt his wife. Atreus adopted Ægiſthus, and ſent him to murder Thyeſtes, who had been ſeized and impriſoned. Thyeſtes knew his ſon, and made himſelf known to him; he made him eſpouſe his cauſe, and inſtead of becoming his father's murderer, he rather avenged his wrongs, and returned to Atreus, whom he aſſaſſinated. *Vid. ATRĪDÆ, a patronymic given by Homer to Agamemnon and Menelaus, as being the ſons of Atreus. This is falſe, upon the authority of Heſiod, Lactantius, Dictys of Crete, &c. who maintain that theſe princes were not the ſons of Atreus, but of Pliſthenes, and that they were brought up in the houſe and under the eye of their grandfather. Vid. Pliſthenes.

ATRONIUS, a friend of Turnus, killed by the Trojans. Virg. Æn. 10.

ATROPATIA, a part of Media. Strab.

ATRŌPOS, one of the Parcæ, daughters of Nox and Erebus. According to the derivation of her name ατρεπτος, immutabilis, ſhe is inexorable, and inflexible, and her duty among the three ſiſters is to cut the thread of life without any regard to ſex, age or quality. She was repreſented by the ancients in a black veil, with a pair of ſciſſars in her hand. Vid. Parcæ.

T. Q. ATTA, a writer of merit in the Auguſtan age, who ſeems to have received this name from ſome deformity in his legs or feet. His compoſitions, dramatical as well as ſatyrical, were held in univerſal admiration. Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 79.

ATTĂLIA, a city of Pamphylia, built by king Attalus. Strab.

ATTĂLUS 1ſt, king of Pergamus, ſucceeded Eumenes 1ſt. He defeated the Gauls who had invaded his dominions, extended his conqueſts to mount Taurus, and obtained the aſſiſtance of the Romans againſt Antiochus. The Athenians rewarded his merit with great honors. He died at Pergamus after a reign of 44 years, B. C. 197. Liv. 26, 27, 28, &c.—Polyb. 5.—Strab. 13.——The 2d of that name, was ſent on an embaſſy to Rome by his brother Eumenes the 2d, and at his return was appointed guardian to his nephew Attalus the 3d, who was then an infant. Pruſias made ſucceſsful war againſt him, and ſeized his capital; but the conqueſt was ſtopped by the interference of the Romans, who reſtored Attalus to his throne. Attalus, who has received the name of Philadelphus, from his fraternal love, was a munificent patron of learning, and the founder of ſeveral cities. He was poiſoned by his nephew in the 82d year of his age, B. C. 138.

138. He governed with great prudence and moderation for 20 years, Strab. 13.—Polyb. 5.——The 3d, ſucceeded to the kingdom of Pergamus, by the murder of Attalus the 2d, and made himſelf odious by his cruelty to his relations, and his wanton exerciſe of power. He was ſon to Eumenes 2d, and ſirnamed Philopator. He left the cares of government to cultivate his garden, and to make experiments on the melting of metals. He lived in great amity with the Romans; and as he died without iſſue by his wife Berenice, he left in his will, the words P. R. meorum hæres eſto, which the Romans interpreted as themſelves, and therefore took poſſeſſion of his kingdom, B. C. 133, and made of it a Roman province, which they governed by a pro-conſul. From this circumſtance, whatever was a valuable acquiſition, or an ample fortune, was always called by the epithet of Attalicus. Attalus, as well as his predeceſſors, made themſelves celebrated for the valuable libraries which they collected at Pergamus, and for the patronage which merit and virtue always found at their court. Liv. 24, &c.—Plin. 7, 8, 33, &c.—Juſtin. 39.—Horat. 1, od. 1.——An officer in Alexander's army. Curt. 4, c. 13.——Another very inimical to Alexander. Attarras, an officer who ſeized thoſe that had conſpired with Dymnus againſt Alexander. Curt. 6.

Atteius Capĭto, a conſul in the age of Auguſtus, who wrote treatiſes on ſacerdotal laws, public courts of juſtice, and the duty of a ſenator.

Attes, a ſon of Calaus of Phrygia, who was born impotent. He introduced the worſhip of Cybele among the Lydians, and became a great favorite of the goddeſs. Jupiter was jealous of his ſucceſs, and ſent a wild boar to lay waſte the country and deſtroy Attes. Pauſ. 7, c. 17.

Atthis, a daughter of Cranaus the 2d, king of Athens, who gave her name to Attica, according to Apollod. 3, c. 14.

Attĭca, a country of Achaia or Hellas, at the ſouth of Bœotia, weſt of the Ægean ſea, north of the Saronicus Sinus, and eaſt of Megara. It received its name from Atthis the daughter of Cranaus. It was originally called Ionia, from the Ionians, who ſettled there; and alſo Acte, which ſignifies ſhore, and Cecropia, from Cecrops one of the kings. The moſt famous of its cities is called Athens, whoſe inhabitants ſometimes bear the name of Attici. Attica was famous for its gold and ſilver mines, which conſtituted the beſt part of the public revenues. The face of the country was partly level, and partly mountainous, divided into the 13 tribes of Acamantis, Æantis, Antiochis, Attalis, Ægeis, Erechtheis, Adrianis, Hippothoontis, Cecropis, Leontis, Æneis, Ptolemais and Pandionis; whoſe inhabitants were numbered in the 116 olympiad, at 31,000 citizens, and 400,000 ſlaves, within 174 villages, ſome of which were conſiderable towns. Vid. Athenæ.

Attĭcus, one of Galba's ſervants who entered his palace with a bloody ſword, and declared he had killed Otho. Tacit. Hiſt. 1.——(T. Pomponius) a celebrated Roman knight to whom Cicero wrote a great number of letters, which contained the general hiſtory of the age. They are now extant, and divided into 17 books. In the time of Marius and Sylla he retired to Athens, where he endeared himſelf to the citizens, who, after his departure, erected ſtatues to him in commemoration of his munificence and liberality. He was ſuch a perfect maſter of the Greek writers, and ſpoke their language ſo fluently, that he was ſirnamed Atticus. He favored the world with ſome of his compoſitions. He behaved in ſuch a diſintereſted manner, that he offended neither of the inimical parties at Rome, and both were equally anxious of courting his approbation. He lived in the greateſt intimacy with the illuſtrious men of his age, and he was ſuch a lover of truth, that he not only abſtained from falſehood even in a joke, but treated with the greateſt contempt and indignation a lying tongue. It is ſaid that he refuſed to take aliments when unable to get the better of a fever, and died in his 77th year, B. C. 32, after bearing the amiable character of peacemaker among his friends. Cornelius Nepos, one of his intimate friends, has written a minute account of his life. Cic. ad Attic. &c.——A Platonic philoſopher in the ſecond century.—A conſul in the age of Nero, &c. Tacit. ann. 15.

Attĭla, a celebrated king of the Huns, a nation in the ſouthern parts of Scythia, who invaded the Roman empire in the reign of Valentinian, with an army of 500,000 men, and laid waſte the provinces. He took the town of Aquileia, and marched againſt Rome; but his retreat and peace were purchaſed with a large ſum of money by the feeble emperor. Attila, who boaſted in the appellation of the ſcourge of God, died A. D. 453, of an uncommon effuſion of blood the firſt night of his nuptials. He had expreſſed his wiſh to extend his conqueſts over the whole world; and he often feaſted his barbarity by dragging

Attilius, a Roman conſul in the firſt Punic war. Vid. Regulus.——Calatinus, a Roman conſul who fought the Carthaginian fleet.——Marcus, a poet who tranſlated the Electra of Sophocles into Latin verſe, and wrote comedies whoſe unintelligible language procured him the appellation of Ferreus.——Regulus, a Roman cenſor who built a temple to the goddeſs of concord. Liv. 23, c. 23, &c.——The name of Attilius was common among the Romans, and many of the public magiſtrates are called Attilii; their life however is not famous for any illuſtrious event.

Attinas, an officer ſet over Bactriana by Alexander. Curt. 8.

Attius Pelignus, an officer of Cæſar. Cæſ. bell. civ. 1.——Tullius, the general of the Volſci, to whom Coriolanus fled when baniſhed from Rome. Liv.——Varus, ſeized Auximum in Pompey's name, whence he was expelled. After this he fled to Africa, which he alienated from J. Cæſar. Cæſ. 1, bell. civ.——A poet. *Vid. Atyadæ, the deſcendants of Atys the Lydian.

Atys, an ancient king of Lydia. Herodot. 1, c. 7.——A ſon of Crœſus king of Lydia. He was forbidden the uſe of all weapons by his father, who had dreamt that he had been killed. Some time after this, Atys prevailed on his father to permit him to go to hunt a wild boar, which laid waſte the country of Myſia, and was killed in the attempt by Adraſtus, whom Crœſus had appointed guardian over his ſon, and the apprehenſions of Crœſus were realized. Herodot. 1, c. 34, &c. — Vid. Adraſtus.——A Trojan, who came to Italy with Æneas, and is ſuppoſed to be the progenitor of the family of the Attii at Rome. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 568.——A youth to whom Iſmene the daughter of Œdipus was promiſed in marriage. He was killed by Tydeus before his nuptials. Stat. Theb. 8, v. 598.——A ſon of Limniace the daughter of the river Ganges, who aſſiſted Cepheus in preventing the marriage of Andromeda, and was killed by Perſeus with a burning log of wood. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 47.——A celebrated ſhepherd of Phrygia, of whom the mother of the gods generally called Cybele became enamoured. She entruſted him with the care of her temple, and made him promiſe he always would live in celibacy. He violated his vow by an amour with the nymph Sangaris, for which the goddeſs made him ſo infane and delirious, that he caſtrated himſelf with a ſharp ſtone. This was afterwards intentionally made by his ſacerdotal ſucceſſors in the ſervice of Cybele, to prevent their breaking their vows of perpetual chaſtity. This account is the moſt general and moſt approved. Others ſay, that the goddeſs became fond of Atys, becauſe he had introduced her feſtivals in the greateſt part of Aſia Minor, and that ſhe herſelf mutilated him. Pauſanias relates, in Achaic. c. 17, that Atys was the ſon of the daughter of the Sangar, who became pregnant by putting the bough of an almond tree in her boſom. Jupiter, as the paſſage mentions, once had an amorous dream, and ſome of the impurity of the god fell upon the earth, which ſoon after produced a monſter of an human form, with the characteriſtics of the two ſexes. This monſter was called Agdiſtis, and was deprived by the gods of thoſe parts which diſtinguiſh the male ſex. From the mutilated parts which were thrown on the ground, roſe an almond tree, one of whoſe branches a nymph of the Sangar gathered, and placed in her boſom as mentioned above. Atys, as ſoon as born, was expoſed in a wood, but preſerved by a ſhe goat. The genius Agdiſtis ſaw him in the wood, and was captivated with his beauty. As Atys was going to celebrate his nuptials with the daughter of the king of Peſſinus, Agdiſtis, who was jealous of his rival, inſpired by his enchantments the king and his future ſon-in-law with ſuch an uncommon fury, that they both attacked and mutilated one another in the ſtruggle. Ovid. ſays, Met. 10, fab. 2, &c. that Cybele changed Atys into a pine-tree as he was going to lay violent hands upon himſelf, and, ever after, that tree was ſacred to the mother of the gods. After his death, Atys received divine honors, and temples were raiſed to his memory, particularly at Dyma. Catull. de Aty. & Berec.—Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 51.——One of the ſeven hills on which part of the city of Rome was built. It was 13,300 feet in circumference, and was given to the people to build houſes upon, by king Ancus Martius. It was not reckoned ed within the precincts of the city till the reign of the emperor Claudius, because the soothsayers looked upon it as a place of ill omen, as Remus had been buried there, whose blood had been criminally shed. The word is derived, according to some, ab avibus, because birds were fond of the place. Others suppose that it receives its name because Aventinus, one of the Alban kings, was buried upon it. Juno, the Moon, Diana, Bona Dea, Hercules, and the goddess of Victory and Liberty, had magnificent temples built upon it. Varro. de L. L. 4.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 235.—Liv. 1, c. 33.

AVERNUS or AVERNA, a lake of Campania, near Baiæ, whose waters were so unwholesome and putrid, that no birds were seen on its banks; hence its original name was ἀορνος, avibus carens. The ancients made it the entrance of hell, as also one of its rivers. Its circumference was five stadia, and its depth could not be ascertained. The waters of the Avernus were indispensibly necessary in all inchantments and magical processes. It may be observed, that all lakes whose stagnated waters were putrid and offensive to the smell, were indiscriminately called Averna. *Virg. AUGA & AUGE & AUGEA, daughter of Aleus king of Tegea, by Neæra, was ravished by Hercules, and brought forth a son, whom she exposed in the woods to conceal her amours from her father. The child was preserved, and called Telephus. Aleus was informed of his daughter's shame, and gave her to Nauplius to be put to death. Nauplius refused to perform the cruel office, and gave Auga to Teuthras, king of Mysia, who, being without issue, adopted her as his daughter. Some time after, the dominions of Teuthras were invaded by an enemy, and the king promised his crown and daughter to him who could deliver him from the impending calamity. Telephus, who had been directed by the oracle to go to the court of Teuthras, if he wished to find his parents, offered his services to the king, and they were accepted. As he was going to unite himself to Auge, in consequence of the victory he had obtained, Auge rushed from him with secret horror, and the gods sent a serpent to separate them. Auge implored the aid of Hercules, who made her son known to her, and she returned with him to Tegea. Pausanias says, that Auge was confined in a coffer with her infant son, and thrown into the sea, where she was found by king Teuthras. Apollod. 2 & 3.—Paus. 8, c. 4.—Hygin. fab. 99 & 100.

AUGIAS & AUGEAS, son of Eleus or Elius, was one of the Argonauts, and afterwards ascended the throne of Elis. He had an immense number of oxen and goats, and the stables in which they were kept had never been cleaned, so that the task seemed an impossibility to any man. Hercules undertook it on promise of receiving for a reward, the tenth part of the herds of Augias, or something equivalent. The hero changed the course of the river Alpheus, or, according to others, of the Peneus, which immediately carried away the dung and filth from the stables. Augias refused the promised recompence, on pretence that Hercules had made use of artifice, and had not experienced any labor or trouble. He farther drove his own son Phyleus from his kingdom, because he supported the claims of Hercules. The refusal was a declaration of war. Hercules conquered Elis, put to death Augias, and gave the crown to Phyleus. Pausanias says, 5, c. 2 & 3, that Hercules spared the life of Augias for the sake of his son, and that Phyleus went to ſettle in Dulichium; and that at the death of Augias, his other ſon, Agaſthenes, ſucceeded to the throne. Augias received, after his death, the honors which were generally paid to a hero. Augias has been called the ſon of Sol, becauſe Elius ſignifies the ſun. The proverb of Augean ſtable is now applied to an impoſſibility. Hygin. fab. 14.—Plin. 17, c. 9.—Strab. 8.—Apollod. 2.

Augures, certain officers at Rome who foretold future events; whence their name, ab avium garritu. They were firſt created by Romulus, to the number of three. Servius Tullius added a fourth, and the tribunes of the people A. U. C. 454, increaſed the number to nine; and Sylla added ſix more, during his dictatorſhip. They had a particular college, and the chief amongſt them was called magiſter collegii. Their office was honorable; and if any one of them was convicted of any crime, he could not be deprived of his privileges; an indulgence granted to no other ſacerdotal body at Rome. The augur generally ſat on a high tower, to make his obſervations. His face was turned towards the eaſt, and he had the north at his left, and the ſouth at his right. With a crooked ſtaff he divided the face of the heavens into four different parts, and afterwards ſacrificed to the gods, covering his head with his veſtment. There were generally five things from which the augurs drew omens: the firſt conſiſted in obſerving the phænomena of the heavens, ſuch as thunder, lightening, comets, &c. The ſecond kind of omen was drawn from the chirping or flying of birds. The third was from the ſacred chickens, whoſe eagerneſs or indifference in eating the bread which was thrown to them, was looked upon as lucky or unlucky. The fourth was from quadrupeds, from their croſſing or appearing in ſome unaccuſtomed place. The fifth was from different caſualties, which were called Dira, ſuch as ſpilling ſalt on a table, or wine upon one's cloaths, hearing ſtrange noiſes, ſtumbling or ſneezing, meeting a wolf, hare, fox, or pregnant bitch. From ſuch ſuperſtitious notions did the Romans draw their prophecies; the ſight of birds on the left hand was always deemed a lucky object, and the words ſiniſter & lævus, though generally ſuppoſed to be terms of ill luck, were always uſed by the augurs in an auſpicious ſenſe. Cic. de Div.—Liv. 1, &c.—*Dionyſ. Augusta, a name given to ſeventy cities in the Roman provinces, in honor of Auguſtus Cæſar.——London, as capital of the country of the Trinobantes, was called Auguſta Trinobantina.——Meſſalina, famous for her debaucheries, was called Auguſta, as wife of the emperor Claudius. Juv. 6, v. 118.

Augustālia, a feſtival at Rome, in commemoration of the day on which Auguſtus returned to Rome, after he had eſtabliſhed peace over the different parts of the empire.

Augustinus, biſhop of Hippo, in Africa, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his writings, as well as by the auſterity of his life. In his works, which are numerous, he diſplayed the powers of a great genius, and an extenſive acquaintance with the philoſophy of Plato. He died in his 76th year of his age, A. D. 430. The beſt edition of his works is that of the Benedict. fol. Ant. 1700 to 1703, 12 vols.

Augustŭlus, the laſt Roman emperor of the Weſt, A. D. 475, conquered by Odoacer, king of the Heruli.

Augustus Octavianus Cæsar, ſecond emperor of Rome, was ſon of Octavius a ſenator, and Accia daughter of Julius, and ſiſter to Julius Cæſar. He was adopted by his uncle Cæſar, and inherited the greateſt part of his fortune. He loſt his father at the age of four; and though only 18 when his uncle was murdered, he haſtened to Rome, where he ingratiated himſelf with the ſenate and people, and received the honors of the conſulſhip two years after, as the reward of his hypocriſy. Though his youth and his inexperience were ridiculed by his enemies, who branded him with the appellation of boy, yet he roſe in conſequence by his prudence and valor, and made war againſt his opponents, on pretence of avenging the death of his murdered uncle. But when he perceived that by making him fight againſt Antony, the ſenate wiſhed to debilitate both antagoniſts, he changed his views, and, uniting himſelf with his enemy, ſoon formed the ſecond triumvirate, in which his cruel proſcriptions ſhed the innocent blood of 300 ſenators and 200 knights, and did not even ſpare the life of his friend Cicero. By the diviſions which were made among the triumvirs, Auguſtus retained for himſelf the more important provinces of the weſt, and baniſhed, as if it were, his colleagues, Lepidus and Antony, to more diſtant territories. But as long as the murderers of Cæſar were alive, the reigning tyrants had reaſons for apprehenſion, and therefore the forces of the triumvirate were directed againſt the partizans of Brutus and the ſenate. The battle was decided at Philippi,

Philippi, where it is ſaid that the valor and conduct of Antony alone preſerved the combined armies, and effected the defeat of the republican forces. The head of the unfortunate Brutus was carried to Rome, and in inſolent revenge thrown at the foot of Cæſar's ſtatue. On his return to Italy, Auguſtus rewarded his ſoldiers with the lands of thoſe that had been proſcribed; but among the ſufferers were many who had never injured the conqueror of Philippi, eſpecially Virgil, whoſe modeſt application procured the reſtitution of his property. The friendſhip which ſubſiſted between Auguſtus and Antony was broken as ſoon as the fears of a third rival vaniſhed away, and the aſpiring heir of Cæſar was eaſily induced to take up arms by the little jealouſies and reſentment of Fulvia. Her death, however, retarded hoſtilities; the two rivals were reconciled; their united forces were ſucceſsfully directed againſt the younger Pompey; and to ſtrengthen their friendſhip, Antony agreed to marry Octavia, the ſiſter of Auguſtus. But as this ſtep was political, and not dictated by affection, Octavia was ſlighted, and Antony reſigned himſelf to the pleaſures and company of the beautiful Cleopatra. Auguſtus was incenſed, and immediately took up arms to avenge the wrongs of his ſiſter, and perhaps more eagerly to remove a man whoſe power and exiſtence kept him in continual alarms, and made him dependent. Both parties met at Actium, B. C. 31. to decide the fate of Rome. Antony was ſupported by all the power of the eaſt, and Auguſtus by Italy. Cleopatra fled from the battle with 60 ſhips, and her flight ruined the intereſt of Antony, who followed her into Egypt. The conqueror ſoon after paſſed into Egypt, beſieged Alexandria, and honored with a magnificent funeral, the unfortunate Roman, and the celebrated queen, whom the fear of being led in the victor's triumph at Rome had driven to commit ſuicide. After he had eſtabliſhed peace all over the world, Auguſtus ſhut up the gates of the temple of Janus, the year our Savior was born. It is ſaid he twice reſolved to lay down the ſupreme power, immediately after the victory obtained over Antony, and on account of his ill health; but his friend Mecænas diſſuaded him, and obſerved, that he would leave it to be the prey of the moſt powerful, and expoſe himſelf to the greateſt dangers. He died at Nola, in the 76th year of his age, A. D. 14, after he had held the ſovereign power during 44 years.—He was an active emperor, and conſulted the good of the Romans with the moſt anxious care. He viſited all the provinces except Africa and Sardinia, and his conſummate prudence and experience gave riſe to many ſalutary laws; but it may ſaid that he finiſhed with a good grace, what he began with cruelty. While making himſelf abſolute, he took care to leave his countrymen the ſhadow of liberty; and if, under the character and office of perpetual tribune, of prieſt and imperator, he was inveſted with all the power of ſovereignty, he guarded againſt offending the jealous Romans, by the aſſumption of the regal title. His refuſal to read the letters he found after Pompey's defeat, aroſe more from fear than refuſal, and he dreaded the diſcovery of names which would have perhaps united to ſacrifice his ambition. His good qualities and many virtues he perhaps never poſſeſſed, have been tranſmitted to poſterity by the pen of adulation or gratitude, in the poems of Virgil, Horace, and Ovid. To diſtinguiſh himſelf from the obſcurity of the Octavii, and, if poſſible, to ſuppreſs the remembrance of his uncle's violent fate, he aſpired after a new title; and the ſubmiſſive ſenate yielded to his ambition, by giving him the honorable appellation of Auguſtus. He has been accuſed of licentiouſneſs and adultery, by his biographer; but the goodneſs of his heart, and the fidelity of his friendſhip, which in ſome inſtances he poſſeſſed, made ſome amends for his natural foibles. He was ambitious of being thought handſome; and as he was publicly reported to be the ſon of Apollo, according to his mother's declaration, he wiſhed his flatterers to repreſent him with the figure and attributes of that god. Like Apollo, his eyes were clear, and he affected to have it thought that they poſſeſſed ſome divine irradiation; and was well pleaſed, if, when he fixed his eyes upon any body, they held down their eyes as if overcome by the glaring brightneſs of the ſun. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning; he was a perfect maſter of the Greek language, and wrote ſome tragedies, beſides memoirs of his life, and other works, all now loſt. He was married three times; to Claudia, Scribonia, and Livia; but he was unhappy in his matrimonial connections, and his only daughter, Julia, by Scribonia, diſgraced herſelf and her father by the debauchery and licentiouſneſs of her manners. He recommended, at his death, his adopted ſon Tiberius as his ſucceſſor. He left his fortune partly to Tiberius, and to Druſus, and made donations to the army and Roman people. Virgil wrote his heroic poem at the deſire of Auguſtus, whom he repreſented under the amiable and perfect character of Æneas. Sueton. in vitâ.—Horat.—Virgil.—Pauſ.—Tacit.—Patercul. Dio.—Caſs.—Ovid.——The name of Auguſtus was afterwards given to his ſucceſſors in the Roman empire as a perſonal, and the name of Cæſar, as a family diſtinction. In a more a more diſtant period of the empire, the title of Auguſtus was given only to the emperor, while that of Cæſar was beſtowed on the ſecond perſon in the ſtate, who was conſidered as preſumptive heir.

It abrogated a clauſe of the Lex Cornelia, and permitted the tribunes to hold other offices after the expiration of the tribuneſhip.

Aurelia, a town of Hiſpania Bætica. ——The mother of J. Cæſar. Suet. in Cæſ. 74.——A fiſh woman. Juv. 4, v. 98.

Aurelianus, emperor of Rome after Flavius Claudius, was auſtere, and even cruel in the execution of the laws, and puniſhed his ſoldiers with uncommon ſeverity. He rendered himſelf famous for his military character; and his expedition againſt Zenobia, the celebrated queen of Palmyra, gained him great honors. He beautified Rome, was charitable to the poor, and the author of many ſalutary laws. He was naturally brave; and in all the battles he fought, it is ſaid he killed no leſs than 800 men with his own hand. In his triumph, he exhibited to the Romans, people of 15 different nations, all of which he had conquered. He was the firſt emperor who wore a diadem. After a glorious reign of ſix years, as he marched againſt the northern barbarians, he was aſſaſſinated near Byzantium, A. D. 275, 29th January, by his ſoldiers, whom Mneſtheus had incited to rebellion againſt their emperor. This Mneſtheus had been threatened with death, for ſome ill behavior to the emperor, and therefore he meditated his death. The ſoldiers, however, ſoon repented of their ingratitude and cruelty to Aurelian, and threw Mneſtheus to be eaten up by wild beaſts.——A phyſician of the fourth century.

AUSON, a ſon of Ulyſſes and Calypſo, from whom the Auſones, a people of Italy, are deſcended.

AUSŌNIA, one of the ancient names of Italy, which it received from Auſon the ſon of Ulyſſes. If Virgil makes Æneas ſpeak of Auſonia, it is by anticipation. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 171.

AUSŌNIUS, a poet in the 4th century, preceptor to Gratian, ſon of the emperor Valentinian, made conſul by the means of his pupil. His compoſitions have been long admired. The thanks he returned the emperor Gratian is one of the beſt of his poems, which were too often hurried for publication, and conſequently not perfect. He wrote the conſular faſti of Rome, an uſeful performance, now loſt. His ſtyle is obſcene, and he has attempted upon the words of Virgil, what revolts every thing againſt his indelicacy. The beſt edition is that of Tollius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1671; or that of Jaubert, with a French tranſlation, 4 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1769.

AUTŎLYCUS, a ſon of Mercury by Chione, a daughter of Dædalion. He was one of the Argonauts. His craft as a thief has been greatly celebrated. He ſtole the flocks of his neighbours, and mingled them with his own, after he had changed their marks. He did the ſame to Siſyphus, ſon of Æolus; but Siſyphus was as crafty as Autolycus, and he knew his own oxen by a mark which he had made under their feet. Autolycus was ſo pleaſed with the artifice of Siſyphus, that he immediately formed an intimacy with him, and even permitted him freely to enjoy the company of his daughter Anticlea, who became pregnant of Ulyſſes, and was ſoon after married to Laertes. Vid. Siſyphus, Laertes. Hygin. fab. 200, &c.—*Ovid. Babylon, a ſon of Belus, who, as ſome ſuppoſe, founded a city which bears his name.—A celebrated city, the capital of the Aſſyrian empire, on the banks of the Euphrates. It had 100 brazen gates; and its walls, which were cemented with bitumen, and greatly enlarged and embelliſhed by the activity of Semiramis, meaſured 480 ſtadia in circumference, 50 cubits in thickneſs, and 200 in height. It was taken by Cyrus, B. C. 538, after he had drained the waters of the Euphrates into a new channel, and marched his troops by night into the town, through the dried bed; and it is ſaid that the fate of the extenſive capital was unknown to the inhabitants of the diſtant ſuburbs till late in the evening. Babylon became famous for the death of Alexander, and for the new empire which was afterwards eſtabliſhed there under the Seleucidæ. [Vid. Syria.] Its greatneſs was ſo reduced in ſucceeding ages, according to Pliny's obſervations, that in his time it was but a deſolate wilderneſs, and at preſent the place where it ſtood is unknown to travellers. The inhabitants were early acquainted with aſtrology. Plin. 6, c. 26.—Herodot. 1, 2, 3.—Juſtin. 1, &c.—Diod. 2.—Xenoph. Cyrop. 7, &c.—Propert. 3, el. 11, v. 21.—*Ovid. Bacchus, was ſon of Jupiter and Semele, the daughter of Cadmus. After ſhe had enjoyed the company of Jupiter, Semele was deceived, and periſhed by the artifice of Juno. This goddeſs, always jealous of her huſband's amours, aſſumed the ſhape of Beroe, Semele's nurſe, and perſuaded Semele that the lover whom ſhe entertained was not Jupiter, but a falſe lover, and that to prove his divinity ſhe ought to beg of him, if he really were Jupiter, to come to her bed with the ſame majeſty as he courted the embraces of Juno. The artifice ſucceeded, and when Jupiter promiſed his miſtreſs whatever ſhe aſked, Semele required him to viſit her with all the divinity of a god. Jupiter was unable to violate his oath; and Semele, unwilling to retract it, therefore, as ſhe was a mortal, and unable to bear the majeſty of Jupiter, ſhe was conſumed, and reduced to aſhes. The child, of which ſhe had been pregnant for ſeven months, was with difficulty ſaved from the flames, and put in his father's thigh, where he remained the full time he naturally was to have been in his mother's womb. From this circumſtance Bacchus has been called Bimater. According to ſome, Dirce, a nymph of the Achelous, ſaved him from the flames. There are different traditions of the manner of his education. Ovid ſays, that, after his birth, he was brought up by his aunt Ino, and afterwards entruſted to the care of the nymphs of Nyſa. Lucian ſuppoſes, that Mercury carried him, as ſoon as born, to the nymphs of Nyſa; and Apollonius ſays, that he was carried by Mercury to a nymph in the iſland of Eubœa, whence he was driven by the power of Juno, who was the chief deity of the place. Some ſupport, that Naxus can boaſt of the place of his education, under the nymphs Philia, Coronis, and Clyda. Pauſanias relates a tradition which prevailed in the town of Braſiæ in Peloponneſus; and accordingly mentions, that Cadmus, as ſoon as he heard of his daughter's amours, ſhut her up, with her child lately born, in a coffer, and expoſed them on the ſea. The coffer was carried ſafe by the waves on the coaſts of Braſiæ; but Semele was found dead, and the child alive. Semele was honored with a magnificent funeral, and Bacchus properly educated. This diverſity of opinions ſhews that there were many of the ſame name. Diodorus ſpeaks of three, and Cicero of a greater number; but among them all, the ſon of Jupiter and Semele ſeems to have obtained the merit of all the reſt. Bacchus is the Oſiris of the Egyptians, and his hiſtory is drawn from the Egyptian traditions concerning that ancient king. Bacchus aſſiſted the gods in their wars againſt the giants, and was cut to pieces; but the ſon of Semele was not then born: this tradition therefore is taken from the hiſtory of Oſiris, who was killed by his brother Typhon, and the worſhip of Oſiris has been introduced by Orpheus into Greece, under the name of Bacchus. In his youth he was taken aſleep in the iſland of Naxos, and carried away by ſome mariners, whom he changed into dolphins, except the pilot, who had expreſſed ſome concern at his misfortune. His expedition into the eaſt is celebrated. He marched, at the head of an army compoſed of men, as well as of women, all inſpired with divine fury, and armed with thyrſuſes, cymbals, and other muſical inſtruments. The leader was drawn in a chariot by a lion and a tyger, and was accompanied by Pan and Silenus, and all the Satyrs. His conqueſts were eaſy, and without bloodſhed; the people eaſily ſubmitted, and gratefully elevated to the rank of a god the hero who taught them the uſe of the vine, the cultivation of the earth, and the manner of making honey. Amidſt his benevolence to mankind, he was relentleſs in puniſhing all want of diſreſpect to his divinity; and the puniſhment he inflicted on Pentheus, Agave, Lycurgus, &c. is well known. He has received the name of Liber, Bromius, Lyæus, Evan, Thyonæus, Piſilas, &c. which are moſtly derived from the places where he received adoration, or from the ceremonies obſerved in his feſtivals. As he was the god of wine, and of drinkers, he is generally repreſented crowned with vine and ivy leaves, with a thyrſus in his hand. His figure is that of an effeminate young man, to denote the joys which commonly prevail at feaſts; and ſometimes that of an old man, to teach us that wine taken immoderately will enervate us, conſume our health, render us loquacious and childiſh like old men, and unable to keep ſecrets. The panther is ſacred to him, becauſe he went in his expedition covered with the ſkin of that beaſt. The magpye is alſo his favorite bird, becauſe in triumphs people were permitted to ſpeak with boldneſs and liberty. Bacchus is ſometimes repreſented like an infant, holding a thyrſus and cluſters of grapes with a horn. He often appears naked, and riding upon the ſhoulders of Pan, or in the arms of Silenus, who was his foſter-father. He alſo ſits upon a celeſtial globe, beſpangled with ſtars, and is then the ſame as the ſun or Oſiris of Egypt. The feſtivals of Bacchus, generally called Orgies, Bacchanalia, or Dionyſia, were introduced into Greece from Egypt by Danaus and his daughters. The infamous debaucheries which aroſe from the celebration of theſe feſtivals, is well known. [Vid. Dionyſia.] The amours of Bacchus are not numerous. He married Ariadne, after ſhe had been forſaken by Theſeus in the iſland of Naxos; and by her he had many children, among whom were Ceranus, Thoas, Œnopion, Tauropolis, &c. According to ſome, he was the father of Hymenæus, whom the Athenians made the god of marriage. The Egyptians ſacrifice pigs to him, before the doors of their houſes. The fir-tree, the yew-tree, the fig-tree, and the ivy, and the vine, were ſacred to him; and the goat was generally ſacrificed to him, on account of the great propenſity of that animal to deſtroy the vine. According to Pliny, he was the firſt who ever wore a crown. His beauty is compared to that of Apollo, and, like him, he is repreſented with fine hair looſely flowing down his ſhoulders, and is ſaid to poſſeſs eternal youth. Sometimes he has horns, either becauſe he taught the cultivation of the earth with oxen, or becauſe Jupiter, his father, appeared to him in the deſarts of Libya under the ſhape of a ram, and ſupplied his thirſty army with water. Bacchus went down to hell to recover his mother, whom Jupiter willingly made a goddeſs, under the name of Thyone. The three perſons of the name of Bacchus, which Diodorus mentions, are, the one who conquered the Indies, and is ſirnamed the bearded Bacchus; a ſon of Jupiter and Proſerpine, who was repreſented with horns; and the ſon of Jupiter and Semele, called the Bacchus of Thebes. Thoſe mentioned by Cicero, are, a ſon of Proſerpine; a ſon of Nilus, who built Nyſa; a ſon of Caprius, who reigned in the Indies; a ſon of Jupiter and the Moon; and a ſon of Thyone and Niſus. *Cic. de Nat. BALEĀRES, three iſlands in the Mediterranean, modernly called Majorca, Minorca, and Yvica, on the coaſt of Spain. The word is derived from βαλλειν to throw, becauſe the inhabitants were expert archers and ſlingers, beſides great pirates. We are told by Florus, that the mothers never gave their children breakfaſt, before they had ſtruck with an arrow a certain mark in a tree. When a woman was married, ſhe was not admitted to her huſband's bed before ſhe had received the embraces of all her relations. The inhabitants were naturally of a laſcivious propenſity, and in their war they required nothing but females and wine, and often changed four men for one woman. Strab. 14.—Flor. 3, c. 8.—Diod. 5.

BALNEÆ (baths) were very numerous at Rome, private as well as public. In the ancient times ſimplicity was obſerved, but in the age of the emperors they became expenſive; they were uſed after walking, exerciſe, or labor, and were deemed more neceſſary than luxurious. Under the emperors it became ſo faſhionable to bathe, that without this the meaneſt of the people ſeemed to be deprived of of one of the neceſſaries of life. There were certain hours of the day appointed for bathing, and a ſmall piece of money admitted the pooreſt as well as the moſt opulent. In the baths there were ſeparate apartments for the people to dreſs and to undreſs; and, after they had bathed, they commonly covered themſelves, rubbed with ointments, the hair was plucked out of the ſkin, and the body rubbed over with a pumice ſtone, and perfumed to render it ſmooth and fair. The Roman emperors generally built baths, and all endeavoured to eclipſe each other in the magnificence of the building. It is ſaid, that Diocletian employed 40,000 of his ſoldiers in building his baths; and when they were finiſhed, he deſtroyed all the workmen. Alexander Severus firſt permitted the people to uſe them in the night, and he himſelf often bathed with the common people. For ſome time both ſexes bathed promiſcuouſly and without ſhame, and the edicts of the emperors proved abortive for a while in aboliſhing that indecent cuſtom, which gradually deſtroyed the morals of the people. They generally read in bathing, and we find many compoſitions written in uſing the bath.

Brachmānes, Indian philoſophers, who derive their name from Brahma, one of the three beings whom God, according to their theology, created, and with whoſe aſſiſtance he formed the world. They devoted themſelves totally to the worſhip of the gods, and were accuſtomed from their youth to endure labor, and to live with frugality and abſtinence. They never eat fleſh, and abſtained from the uſe of wine, and all carnal enjoyments. After they had ſpent 37 years in the greateſt trials, they were permitted to marry, and indulge themſelves in a more free and unbounded manner. According to modern authors, Brahma is the parent of all mankind, and he produced as many worlds as there are parts in the body, which they reckoned 14. They believed that there were ſeven ſeas, of water, milk, curds, butter, ſalt, ſugar, and wine, each bleſſed with its particular paradiſe. Strab. 15.—Diod. 17.

Brǽsia, a daughter of Cinyra and Metharme. Apollod. 3, c. 14.

Branchiădes, a ſirname of Apollo.

Branchĭdæ, a people of Aſia near the river Oxus, put to the ſword by Alexander. They were originally of Miletus, near the temple of Branchus, but had been removed from thence by Xerxes. Strab. 11.—Curt. 7, c. 5.——The prieſts of Apollo Didymæus. Plin. 5, c. 29.

Branchyllĭdes, a chief of the Bœotians. Pauſ. 9, c. 13.

Branchus, a youth of Miletus, beloved by Apollo, who gave him the power of prophecy. He gave oracles at Didyme, which became inferior to none of the Grecian oracles, except Delphi, and which exchanged the name of Didymean to that of Branchidæ. The temple, according to Strabo, was ſet on fire by Xerxes, who took poſſeſſion of the riches it contained, and tranſported the people into Sogdiana, where they built a city, which was afterwards deſtroyed by Alexander. Strab. 15.—Stat. Theb. 3, v. 479.—Lucian. de Dom.

Brasiæ, a town of Laconia. Pauſ. 3, c. 24.

Brasĭdas, a famous general of Lacedæmon, ſon of Tellis, who, after many great victories over Athens and other Grecian ſtates, died of a wound at Amphipolis, which Cleon, the Athenian, had beſieged, B. C. 422. A ſuperb monument was raiſed to his memory. Pauſ. 3. c. 24.—Thucyd. 4 & 5.—Diod. 5.——A man of Cos. Theocrit. Id. 7.

Brasidēia, feſtivals at Lacedæmon, in honor of Braſidas. None but freemen born Spartans were permitted to enter the liſts, and ſuch as were abſent were fined.

Braure, a woman who aſſiſted in the murder of Pittacus, king of the Edoni. Thucyd. 4, c. 107.

Brauron, a town of Attica, where Diana had a temple. The goddeſs had three feſtivals called Brauronia, celebrated once every fifth year by ten men who were called ἐξηγηται. They ſacrificed a goat to the goddeſs, and it was uſual to ſing one of the books of Homer's Iliad. The moſt remarkable that attended were young virgins in yellow gowns, conſecrated to Diana. They were about ten years of age, and not under five, and therefore their conſecration was called δεκατευειν, from δεκα, decem; and ſometimes αρκτευειν, as the virgins themſelves bore the name of αρκτοι, bears, from this circumſtance. There was a bear in one of the villages of Attica, ſo tame, that he ate with the inhabitants, and played harmleſsly with them. This familiarity laſted long, till a young virgin treated the animal too roughly, and was killed by it. The virgin's brothers killed the bear, and the country was ſoon after viſited by a peſtilence. The oracle was conſulted, and the plague removed by conſecrating virgins to the ſervice of Diana. This was ſo faithfully obſerved, that no woman in Athens was ever married before a previous conſecration to the goddeſs. The ſtatue of Diana of Tauris, which had been brought into Greece by Iphigenia, was preſerved in the town of Brauron. Xerxes carried it away when he invaded Greece. Pauſ. 8, c. 46.—Strab. 9.

Brenni & Breuni, a people of Noricum. Horat. 4, od. 14.

Brennus, a general of the Galli Senones, who entered Italy, defeated the Romans at the river Allia, and entered their city without out oppoſition. The Romans fled into the capitol, and left the whole city in the poſſeſſion of the enemies. The Gauls climbed the Tarpeian rock in the night, and the capitol would have been taken, had not the Romans been awakened by the noiſe of geeſe which were before the doors, and immediately repelled the enemy. Camillus, who was in baniſhment, marched to the relief of his country, and ſo totally defeated the Gauls, that not one remained to carry the news of their deſtruction. Liv. 5, c. 36, &c.—Plut. in Camill.——Another Gaul, who made an irruption into Greece with 150,000 men and 15,000 horſe, and endeavoured to deſtroy the temple of Apollo at Delphi. He was deſtroyed, with all his troops, by the god, or more properly he killed himſelf in a fit of intoxication, B. C. 278, after being defeated by the Delphians. Pauſ. 10, c. 22 & 23.—Juſtin. 24, c. 6, &c.

BRENTHE, a ruined city of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 28.

BRESCIA, a city of Italy, who had gods peculiar to itſelf.

BRETTII, a people of Italy. Strab. 6.

BRIĂREUS, a famous giant, ſon of Cœlus and Terra, who had 100 hands and 50 heads, and was called by men Ægeon, and only by the gods Briareus. When Juno, Neptune, and Minerva conſpired to dethrone Jupiter, Briareus aſcended the heavens, and ſat himſelf next to him, and ſo terrified the conſpirators by his fierce and threatening looks, that they deſiſted. He aſſiſted the giants in their war againſt the gods, and was thrown under mount Ætna, according to ſome accounts. Heſiod. Theog. v. 148—Apollod. 1, c. 1.—Homer. Il. 1, v. 403—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 287. l. 10, v. 565.——A Cyclop, made judge between Apollo and Neptune, in their diſpute about the Iſthmus and promontory of Corinth. He gave the former to Neptune, and the latter to Apollo. Pauſ. 2, c. 1.

BRIAS, a town of Piſidia.

BRIGANTES, a people in the northern parts of Britain. Juv. 14, v. 196.—Pauſ. 8, c. 43.

BRIGANTĪNUS, a lake of Rhætia between the Alps, with a town called Brigantium. Plin. 9, c. 17.

BRILESSUS, a mountain of Attica. Thucyd. 2, c. 23.

BRĪMO, (terror) a name given to Proſerpine and Hecate. Propert. 2, el. 2. v 11.

BRISĒIS, a girl of Lyrneſſus, called alſo Hippodamia. When her country was taken by the Greeks, and her huſband and brother killed in the fight, ſhe fell to the ſhare of Achilles, in the diviſion of the ſpoils. Agamemnon took her away ſome time after from Achilles, who made a vow to abſent himſelf from the field of battle. Briſeis was very faithful to Achilles; and when Agamemnon reſtored her to him, he ſwore he had never offended her chaſtity. Homer. Il. 1, 2, &c.—Ovid. Heroid. 3, de Art. Am. 2 & 3.—Propert. 2, el. 8, 20 & 22.—Pauſ. 5, c. 24.—Horat. 2, od. 4.

BRISES, a man of Lyrneſſus, brother to the prieſt Chryſes. His daughter Hippodamia, was called Briſeis from him.

BRISEUS, a ſirname of Bacchus, from his nurſe of the ſame name, or his temple at Briſa, a promontory of Leſbos. Perſius 1, v. 76.

BRITANNI, the inhabitants of Britain. [Vid. Britannia.] A nation in Gallia Belgica. Plin 4, c. 17.

BRITANNIA, an iſland in the northern ocean, the greateſt in Europe, B. C. 55, conquered by J. Cæſar during his Gallic wars, and firſt known to be an iſland by Agricola, who ſailed round it. It was a Roman province from the time of its conqueſt till the 448th year of the chriſtian era. The inhabitants, in the age of Cæſar, uſed to paint their bodies, to render themſelves more terrible in the eyes of their enemies. The name of Britain was unknown to the Romans before Cæſar conquered it. Cæſ. bell. G. 4.—Dio. 5.—Pauſ. 1, c. 33.—Tacit. in Agric. 10.—Plin. 34, c. 17.

BRITANNĪCUS, a ſon of Claudius Cæſar by Meſſalina. Nero was raiſed to the throne in preference to him, by means of Agrippina, and cauſed him to be poiſoned. His corpſe was buried in the night; but it is ſaid that a ſhower of rain waſhed away the white paint which the murderer had put over his face, ſo that it appeared quite black, and diſcovered the effects of poiſon. Tacit. Ann.—Sueton. in Ner. c. 33.

BRITOMARTIS, a beautiful nymph of Crete, daughter of Jupiter and Charme. She was loved by Minos, who purſued her ſo cloſely, that, to avoid his importunities, ſhe threw herſelf into the ſea. Pauſ. 2, c. 30. l. 3. c. 14.——A ſirname of Diana.

BRITOMARUS, a chief of the Galli Inſubres, conquered by Æmilius. Flor. 2, c. 4.

BRITŎNES, the inhabitants of Britain. Juv. 15, v. 124.

BRIXELLUM, a town in Italy near Mantua. Tacit. Hiſt. 2, c. 32.

BRIXIA, a town of Italy beyond the Po. Juſtin. 20, c. 5.

BRIZO, the goddeſs of dreams, worſhipped in Delos.

BROCUBĒLUS, a governor of Syria, who fled to Alexander, when Darius was murdered by Beſſus. Curt. 5, c. 13.

BROMIUS, a ſirname of Bacchus, from Βρεμειν, frendere, alluding to the groans which Semele uttered when conſumed by Jupiter's fire. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 11.——A ſon of Ægyptus. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

Bromus, one of the Centaurs. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 459.

Brongus, a river falling into the Iſter. Herodot. 4, c. 49.

Brontes, (thunder) one of the Cyclops. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 425.

Broteas & Ammon, two men famous for their ſkill in the ceſtus. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 107.

Brotheus, a ſon of Vulcan and Minerva, who burned himſelf to avoid the ridicule to which his deformity ſubjected him. Ovid. in Ib. v. 517.

Bructĕri, a people of Germany. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 51.

Brumālia, feſtivals celebrated at Rome in honor of Bacchus, about the month of December. They were firſt inſtituted by Romulus.

Brandŭsium, a city of Calabria, on the Adriatic ſea, where the Appian road was terminated. It was founded by Diomedes after the Trojan war, or according to Strabo, by Theſeus, with a Cretan colony. The Romans generally embarked at Brandufium for Greece. It is famous for the birth of the poet Pacuvius, and the death of Virgil. Juſtin. 3, c. 4. l. 12, c. 2.—Strab. 5.—Cæſ. bell. Civ. 1, c. 24.—Cic. at Attic. 4, ep. 1.

Brutidius, a man dragged to priſon in Juvenal's age, on ſuſpicion of his favoring Sejanus. Juv. 10, v. 82.

Brutii, a people in the fartheſt parts of Italy, who were originally ſhepherds of the Lucanians, but revolted, and went in queſt of a ſettlement. They received the name of Brutii, from their ſtupidity and cowardice in ſubmitting, without oppoſition, to Annibal in the 2d Punic war. They were ever after held in the greateſt diſgrace, and employed in every ſervile work. Juſtin. 23, c. 9.—Strab. 6.—Diod. 16.

Brutŭlus, a Samnite, who killed himſelf, upon being delivered to the Romans for violating a treaty. Liv. 8, c. 39.

Brutus, L. Junius, ſon of M. Junius and Tarquinia ſecond daughter of Tarquin Priſcus. The father, with his eldeſt ſon, were murdered by Tarquin the Proud; and Lucius, unable to revenge their death, pretended to be inſane. The artifice ſaved his life; he was called Brutus for his ſtupidity, which he however ſoon after ſhewed to be feigned. When Lucretia killed herſelf, B. C. 509. in conſequence of the brutality of Tarquin, Brutus ſnatched the dagger from the wound, and ſwore, upon the reeking blade, immortal hatred to the royal family. His example was followed; the Tarquins were proſcribed by a decree of the ſenate, and the royal authority veſted in the hands of conſuls choſen from patrician families. Brutus, in his conſular office, made the people ſwear they never would again ſubmit to kingly authority; but the firſt who violated their oath were in his own family. His ſons conſpired with the Tuſcan ambaſſador to reſtore the Tarquins; and when diſcovered, they were tried and condemned before their father, who himſelf attended at their execution. Some time after, in a combat that was fought between the Romans and Tarquins, Brutus engaged with Aruns, and ſo fierce was the attack that they pierced one another at the ſame time. The dead body was brought to Rome, and received, as in triumph; a funeral oration was ſpoken over it, and the Roman matrons ſhowed their grief by mourning a year for the father of the republic. Flor. 1, c. 9.—Liv. 1, c. 56. l. 2, c. 1, &c.—Dionyſ. Hal. 4 & 5.—C. Nep. in Attic. 8.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 818. Plut. in Brut. & Cæſ.——Marcus Junius, father of Cæſar's murderer, wrote three books on civil law. He followed the party of Marius, and was conquered by Pompey. After the death of Sylla, he was beſieged in Mutina by Pompey, to whom he ſurrendered, and by whoſe orders he was put to death. He had married Servilia, Cato's ſiſter, by whom he had a ſon and two daughters. Cic. de Orat. c. 55.—Plut. in Brut.——His ſon of the ſame name by Servilia, was lineally deſcended from J. Brutus, who expelled the Tarquins from Rome. He ſeemed to inherit the republican principle of his great progenitor, and in the civil wars joined himſelf to the ſide of Pompey, though he was his father's murderer, only becauſe he looked upon him as more juſt and candid in his claims. At the battle of Pharſalia, Cæſar not only ſpared the life of Brutus, but he made him one of his moſt faithful friends. He however forgot this, becauſe Cæſar aſpired to tyranny. He conſpired with many of the moſt illuſtrious citizens of Rome againſt the tyrant, and ſtabbed him in Pompey's Baſilica. The tumult which this murder occaſioned was great; the conſpirators fled to the capitol, and by proclaiming freedom and liberty to the populace, they re-eſtabliſhed tranquillity in the city. Antony, whom Brutus, contrary to the opinion of his aſſociates, refuſed to ſeize, gained ground in behalf of his friend Cæſar, and the murderers were ſoon obliged to leave Rome. Brutus retired into Greece, where he gained himſelf many friends by his arms, as well as by perſuaſion, ſon, and he was ſoon after purſued thither by Antony, whom young Octavius accompanied. A battle was fought at Philippi. Brutus, who commanded the right wing of the republican army, defeated the enemy; but Caſſius, who had the care of the left, was overpowered, and as he knew not the ſituation of his friend, and grew deſperate, he ordered one of his freed-men to run him through. Brutus deeply deplored his fall, and in the fulneſs of his grief, called him the laſt of the Romans. In another battle, the wing which Brutus commanded obtained a victory; but the other was defeated, and he found himſelf ſurrounded by the ſoldiers of Antony. He however made his eſcape, and ſoon after fell upon his ſword, B. C. 42. Antony honored him with a magnificent funeral. Brutus is not leſs celebrated for his literary talents, than his valor in the field. When he was in the camp, the greateſt part of his time was employed in reading and writing; and the day which preceded one of his moſt bloody battles, while every one was under continual apprehenſions, Brutus calmly ſpent his hours till the evening, in writing an epitome of Polybius. He was fond of imitating the auſtere virtues of Cato, and in reading the hiſtories of nations he imbibed thoſe principles of freedom which were ſo eminently diſplayed in his political career. He was intimate with Cicero, to whom he would have communicated his conſpiracy, had he not been apprehenſive of his great timidity. He ſeverely reprimanded him in his letters for joining the ſide of Octavius, who meditated the ruin of the republic. Plutarch mentions, that Cæſar's ghoſt made its appearance to Brutus in his tent, and told him that he would meet him at Philipoi. Brutus married Porcia, the daughter of Cato, who killed herſelf, by ſwallowing burning coals when ſhe heard the fate of her huſband. C. Nep. in Attic.—Paterc. 2, c. 48. Plut. in Brut. & Cæſ. 1.—Flor. 4.——D. Jun. Albinus, one of Cæſar's murderers, who, after the battle of Mutina, was deſerted by the legions, with which he wiſhed to march againſt Antony. He was put to death by Antony's orders, though conſul elect.——Jun. one of the firſt tribunes of the people. Plut.——One of Carbo's generals.

Bucephalus, a horſe of Alexander's, whoſe head reſembled that of a bull, whence his name (βους κεφαλος, bovis caput). Alexander was the only one who could mount on his back, and he always knelt down to take up his maſter. He was preſent in an engagement in Aſia, where he received a heavy wound, and haſtened immediately out of the battle, and dropped down dead as ſoon as he had ſet down the king in a ſafe place. He was 30 years old when he died, and Alexander built a city which he called after his name. Plut. in Alex.—Curt.—Arrian. 5, c. 3.—Plin. 8, c. 42.

Bucolica, a ſort of poem which treats of the care of the flocks, and of the pleaſures and occupations of the rural life, with ſimplicity and elegance. The moſt famous paſtoral writers of antiquity are Moſchus, Bion, Theocritus and Virgil. The invention of Bucolics, or paſtoral poetry, is attributed to a ſhepherd of Sicily.

Byzacium, a country of Africa.

Byzantium, a town ſituate on the Thracian Boſporus, founded by a colony of Megara, under the conduct of Byzas, 658 years before the Chriſtian era. Paterculus ſays it was founded by the Mileſians, and by the Lacedæmonians according to Juſtin, and according to Ammianus by the Athenians. The pleaſantneſs and convenience of its ſituation was obſerved by Conſtantine the Great, who made it the capital of the eaſtern Roman empire, A. D. 328, and called it Conſtantinopolis. A number of Greek writers, who have deſerved or uſurped the name of Byzantine hiſtorians, floriſhed at Byzantium, after the ſeat of the empire had been tranſlated thither from Rome. Their works, which more particularly relate to the time in which they floriſhed, and are ſeldom read but by thoſe who wiſh to form an acquaintance with the revolutions of the lower empire, were publiſhed in one large collection, in 36 vols. folio, 1648, &c. at Paris, and recommended themſelves by the notes and ſupplement of Du Freſne du Cange. They were likewiſe printed at Venice 1729, in 23 vols. though perhaps this edition is not ſo valuable as that of the French. Strab. 1.—Paterc. 2, c. 15.—*C. Nep. in Pauſ. Cabassus, a town of Cappadocia.—A village near Tarſus.

Caballio, a town of Gaul.

Cabīra, a wife of Vulcan, by whom ſhe had three ſons.—A town of Paphlagonia.

Cabīri, certain deities whoſe worſhip was held in the greateſt veneration at Thebes and Lemnos, but more particularly in the iſlands of Samothrace and Imbros. The number of theſe deities is uncertain. Some ſay there were only two, Jupiter and Bacchus; others mention three, and ſome four, Aſchieros, Achiocherſa, Achiocherſus, & Camillus. It is unknown where their worſhip was firſt eſtabliſhed; yet Phœnicia ſeems to be the place according to the authority of Sanchoniathon, and from thence it was introduced into Greece by the Pelaſgi. The feſtivals or myſteries of the Cabiri, were celebrated with the greateſt ſolemnity at Samothrace, where all the ancient heroes and princes were generally initiated, as their power ſeemed to be great in protecting perſons from ſhipwreck and ſtorms. The obſcenities which prevailed in the celebration have obliged the authors of every country to paſs over them in ſilence, and ſay that it was unlawful to reveal them. Theſe deities are often confounded with the Corybantes, Anaces, Dioſcuri, &c. and according to Herodotus, Vulcan was their father. This author mentions the ſacrilege which Cambyſes committed in entering their temple, and turning to ridicule their ſacred myſteries. They were ſuppoſed to preſide over metals, Herodot. 2, c. 51.—Strab. 10, &c.—Pauſ. 9, c. 22, &c.—Cic. de Nat. D. 1.

CACHALES, a river of Phocis. Pauſ. 10, c. 32.

CACUS, a famous robber, ſon of Vulcan and Meduſa, repreſented as a three headed monſter, and as vomiting flames. He reſided in Italy, and the avenues of his cave were covered with human bones. He plundered the neighbouring country; and when Hercules returned from the conqueſt of Geryon, Cacus ſtole ſome of his cows, and dragged them backwards into his cave, to prevent diſcovery. Hercules departed without perceiving the theft; but his oxen having lowed, were anſwered by the cows in the cave of Cacus, and the hero became acquainted with the loſs he had ſuſtained. He ran to the place, attacked Cacus, ſqueezed and ſtrangled him in his arms, though vomiting fire and ſmoke. Hercules erected an altar to Jupiter Servator, in commemoration of his victory; and an annual feſtival was inſtituted by the inhabitants, in honor of the hero, who had delivered them of ſuch a public calamity. Ovid. 1, Faſt. v. 551.—*Virg. CACYPĂRIS, a river of Sicily.

CADI, a town of Phrygia. Strab. 12.—Of Lydia. Propert. 4, el. 6, v. 7.

CADMĒA, a citadel of Thebes, built by Cadmus. It is generally taken for Thebes itſelf, and the Thebans are often called Cadmeans. Stat. Theb. 8, v. 601. Pauſ. 2, c. 5.

CADMĒIS, an ancient name of Bœotia.

CADMUS, ſon of Agenor king of Phœnicia, by Telephaſſa or Agriope, was ordered by his father to go in queſt of his ſiſter Europa, whom Jupiter had carried away, and he was never to return to Phœnicia if he did not bring her back. As his ſearch proved fruitleſs, he conſulted the oracle of Apollo, and was ordered to build a city where he ſhould ſee a young heifer ſtop in the graſs, and call the country Bœotia. He found the heifer according to the directions of the oracle; and as he wiſhed to thank the god by a ſacrifice, he ſent his companions to fetch water from a neighbouring grove. The waters were ſacred to Mars, and guarded by a dragon, who devoured all the Phœnician's attendants. Cadmus, tired of their ſeeming delay, went to the place, and ſaw the monſter ſtill feeding on their fleſh. He attacked the dragon, and overcame it by the aſſiſtance of Minerva, and ſowed the teeth in a plain, upon which armed men ſuddenly roſe up from the ground. He threw a ſtone in the midſt of them, and they inſtantly turned their arms one againſt the other, till all periſhed except five, who aſſiſted him in building his city. Soon after he married Hermione the daughter of Venus, with whom he lived in the greateſt cordiality, and by whom he had a ſon, Polydorus, and four daughters, Ino, Agave, Autonoe, and Semele. Juno perſecuted thoſe children; and their well-known misfortunes ſo diſtracted Cadmus and Hermione, that they retired to Illyricum, loaded with grief, and infirm with age. They intreated the gods to remove them from the misfortunes of life, and they were immediately changed into ſerpents. Some explain the dragon's fable, by ſuppoſing that it was a king of the country that Cadmus conquered by war; and the armed men riſing from the field, is no more than men armed with braſs, according to the ambiguous ſignification of a Phœnician word. Cadmus was the firſt who introduced the uſe of letters in Greece; but ſome maintain, that the alphabet which he brought from Phœnicia, was only different from that which was uſed by the ancient inhabitants of Greece. This alphabet conſiſted only of 16 letters, to which Palamedes afterwards added four, and Simonides of Melos the ſame number. The worſhip of many of the Egyptian and Phœnician deities was alſo brought into Greece by Cadmus, who is ſuppoſed to have come into Greece 1493 years before the Chriſtian era, and to have died 61 years after. According to thoſe who believe that Thebes was built at the ſound of Amphion's lyre, Cadmus built only a ſmall citadel which he called Cadmea, and laid the foundations of a city which was finiſhed by one of his ſucceſſors. *Ovid. of Attica, in 16 books. Diod. 1.—Dionyſ. Hal. 2.—Clement. Alexand. 3.—Strab. 1.—Plin. 5, c. 29.——A Roman executioner, mentioned Horat. 1, Sat. 6, v. 39.

CADRA, a hill of Aſia Minor. Tacit.

CADŪCEUS, a rod entwined at one end by two ſerpents, in the form of two equal ſemicircles. It was the attribute of Mercury, and had been given him by Apollo in return for the lyre. Various interpretations have been put upon the two ſerpents round it. Some ſuppoſe them to be a ſymbol of Jupiter's amours with Rhea, when theſe two deities transformed themſelves into ſnakes. Others ſay, that it originates from Mercury's having appeaſed the fury of two ſerpents that were fighting, by touching them with his rod. Prudence is generally ſuppoſed to be repreſented by theſe two ſerpents, and the wings are the ſymbol of diligence; both neceſſary in the purſuit of buſineſs and commerce, which Mercury patronized. With it Mercury conducted to the infernal regions the ſouls of the dead, and could lull to ſleep, and even raiſe to life a dead perſon. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 242.—Horat. 1, od. 10.

Cæresi, a people of Germany. Cæſ.

Cæsar, a ſirname given to the Julian family at Rome, either becauſe one of them kept an elephant, which bears the ſame name in the Punic tongue, or becauſe one was born with a thick head of hair. This name, after it had been dignified in the perſon of Julius Cæſar, and of his ſucceſſors, was given to the apparent heir of the empire, in the age of the Roman emperors. The twelve firſt Roman emperors were diſtinguiſhed by the ſirname of Cæſar. They reigned in the following order: Julius Cæſar, Auguſtus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, Galba, Otho, Vitellius, Veſpaſian, Titus, and Domitian. In Domitian, or rather in Nero, the family of Julius Cæſar was extinguiſhed. But after ſuch a lapſe of time, the appellation of Cæſar ſeemed inſeparable from the imperial dignity, and therefore it was aſſumed by the ſucceſſors of the Julian family. Suetonius has written an account of theſe twelve characters, in an extenſive and impartial manner.——C. Julius Cæſar, the firſt emperor of Rome, was ſon of L. Cæſar and Aurelia the daughter of Cotta. He was deſcended, according to ſome accounts, from Julus the ſon of Æneas. When he reached his 15th year he loſt his father, and the year after he was made prieſt of Jupiter. Sylla was aware of his ambition, and endeavoured to remove him; but Cæſar underſtood his intentions, and, to avoid diſcovery, changed every day his lodgings. He was received into Sylla's friendſhip ſome time after; and the dictator told thoſe who ſolicited the advancement of young Cæſar, that they were warm in the intereſt of a man who would prove ſome day or other the ruin of their country and of their liberty. When Cæſar went to finiſh his ſtudies at Rhodes, under Apollonius Molo, he was ſeized by pirates, who offered him his liberty for 30 talents. He gave them 40, and threatened to revenge their impudence; and no ſooner was he out of their power, than he armed a ſhip, purſued them, and crucified them all. His eloquence procured him friends at Rome; and the generous manner in which he lived, equally ſerved to promote his intereſt. He obtained the office of high prieſt at the death of Metellus; and after he had paſſed thro' the inferior employments of the ſtate, he was appointed over Spain, where he ſignalized himſelf by his valor and intrigues. At his return to Rome, he was made conſul, and ſoon after he brought a reconciliation between Craſſus and Pompey. He was appointed for the ſpace of five years over the Gauls, by the intereſt of Pompey, to whom he had given his daughter Julia in marriage. Here he enlarged the boundaries of the Roman empire by conqueſt, and invaded Britain, which was then unknown to the Roman people. He checked the Germans, and ſoon after had his government over Gaul prolonged to five other years, by means of his friends at Rome. The death of Julia and of Craſſus, the corrrupted ſtate of the Roman ſenate, and the ambition of Cæſar and Pompey, ſoon became the cauſes of a civil war. Neither of theſe celebrated Romans would ſuffer a ſuperior, and the ſmalleſt matters were ſufficient ground for unſheathing the ſword. Cæſar's petitions were received with coldneſs or indifference by the Roman ſenate; and, by the influence of Pompey, a decree was paſſed to ſtrip him of his power. Antony, who oppoſed it as tribune, fled to Cæſar's camp with the news; and the ambitious general no ſooner heard this, than he made it a plea of reſiſtance. On pretence of avenging the violence which had been offered to the ſacred office of tribune in the perſon of Antony, he croſſed the Rubicon, which was the boundary of his province. The paſſage of the Rubicon was a declaration of war, and Cæſar entered Italy ſword in hand. Upon this, Pompey, with all the friends of liberty, left Rome, and retired to Dyrrachium; and Cæſar, after he had ſubdued all Italy, in 60 days, entered Rome, and provided himſelf with money from the public treaſury. He went to Spain, where he conquered the partizans of Pompey, under Petreius, Afranius, and Varro; and, at his return to Rome, was declared dictator, and ſoon after conſul. When he left Rome, he went in queſt of Pompey, obſerving that he was marching againſt a general without troops, after having defeated troops without a general in Spain. In the plains of Pharſalia, B. C. 48, the two hoſtile generals engaged. Pompey was conquered, and fled into Egypt, where he was murdered. Cæſar; after he had made a noble uſe of victory, purſued his adverſary into Egypt, where he ſometimes forgot his fame and character in the arms of Cleopatra, by whom he had a ſon. His danger was great while at Alexandria; but he extricated himſelf with wonderful ſucceſs, and made Egypt tributary to his power. After ſeveral conqueſts in Africa, the defeat of Cato, Scipio, and Juba, and that of Pompey's ſons in Spain, he entered Rome, and triumphed over five different nations, Gaul, Alexandria, Pontus, Africa, and Spain, and was created perpetual dictator. But now his glory was at an end, his uncommon ſucceſs created him enemies, and the chiefeſt of the ſenators, among whom was Brutus his moſt intimate friend, conſpired againſt him, and ſtabbed him in the ſenate-houſe on the ides of March. He died, pierced with 23 wounds, the 15th of March, B. C. 44, in the 56th year of his age. Caſca gave him the firſt blow, and immediately he attempted to make ſome reſiſtance; but when he ſaw Brutus among the conſpirators, he ſubmitted to his fate, and fell down at their feet, muffling up his mantle, and exclaiming, Tu quoque Brute! Cæſar might have eſcaped the ſword of the conſpirators, if he had liſtened to the advice of his wife, whoſe dreams, on the night previous to the day of his murder, were alarming. He alſo received, as he went to the ſenate-houſe, a paper from Artemidorus, which diſcovered the whole conſpiracy to him; but he neglected the reading of what might have ſaved his life. When he was in his firſt campaign in Spain, he was obſerved to gaze at a ſtatue of Alexander, and even he ſhed tears at the recollection that that hero had conquered the world at an age in which he himſelf had done nothing. The learning of Cæſar deſerves commendation, as well as his military character. He reformed the calendar. He wrote his commentaries on the Gallic wars, on the ſpot where he fought his battles; and the compoſition has been admired for the elegance as well as the correctneſs of its ſtyle. This valuable book was nearly loſt; and when Cæſar ſaved his life in the bay of Alexandria, he was obliged to ſwim from his ſhip, with his arms in one hand, and his commentaries in the other. Beſides the Gallic and Civil wars, he wrote other pieces, which are now loſt. The hiſtory of the war in Alexandria and Spain, is attributed to him by ſome, and by others to Hirtius. Cæſar has been blamed for his debaucheries and expences; and the firſt year he had a public office, his debts were rated at 830 talents, which his friends diſcharged: yet, in his public character, he muſt be reckoned one of the few heroes that now and then make their appearance among mankind. His qualities were ſuch that in every battle he could not be but conqueror, and in every republic, maſter; and to his ſenſe of his ſuperiority over the reſt of the world, or to his ambition, we are to attribute his ſaying, that he wiſhed rather to be firſt in a little village, than ſecond at Rome. It was after his conqueſt over Pharnaces in one day, that he made uſe of theſe remarkable words, to expreſs the celerity of his operations; Veni, vidi, vici. Conſcious of the ſervices of a man who, in the intervals of peace, beautified and enriched the capital of his his country with public buildings, libraries, and porticos, the ſenate permitted the dictator to wear a laurel crown on his bald head; and it is ſaid, that, to reward his benevolence, they were going to give him the title or authority of king all over the Roman empire, except Italy, when he was murdered. In his private character, Cæſar has been accuſed of ſeducing one of the veſtal virgins, and ſuſpected of being privy to Catiline's conſpiracy; and it was his fondneſs for diſſipate pleaſures which made his countrymen ſay, that he was the huſband of all the women at Rome, and the woman of all men. It is ſaid that he conquered 300 nations, took 800 cities, and defeated three millions of men, one of which fell in the field of battle. Plin. 7, c. 25, ſays, that he could employ at the ſame time, his ears to liſten, his eyes to read, his hand to write, and his mind to dictate. His death was preceded, as many authors mention, by uncommon prodigies; and immediately after his death, a large comet made its appearance. The beſt editions of Cæſar's commentaries, are the magnificent one by Dr. Clarke, fol. Lond. 1712; that of Cambridge, with a Greek tranſlation, 4to. 1727; that of Oudendorp. 2 vols. 4to. L. C. Calĭgŭla, the emperor, received this ſirname from his wearing in the camp, the Caliga, a military covering for the leg. He was ſon of Germanicus by Agrippina, and grandſon to Tiberius. During the firſt 8 months of his reign, Rome expected univerſal proſperity, the exiles were recalled, taxes were remitted, and profligates diſmiſſed; but Caligula ſoon became proud, wanton, and cruel. He built a temple to himſelf, and ordered his head to be placed on the images of the gods, while he wiſhed to imitate the thunders and power of Jupiter. The ſtatues of all great men were removed, as if Rome would ſooner forget her virtues in their abſence; and he appeared in public places in the moſt indecent manner, encouraged roguery, committed inceſt with his three ſiſters, and eſtabliſhed public places of proſtitution. He often amuſed himſelf with putting innocent people to death; he attempted to famiſh Rome, by a monopoly of corn; and as he was pleaſed with the greateſt diſaſters which befell his ſubjects, he often wiſhed the Romans had but one head, that he might have the gratification to ſtrike it off; wild beaſts were conſtantly fed in his palace with human victims, and a favorite horſe was made high-prieſt and conſul, and kept in marble apartments, and adorned with the moſt valuable trappings and pearls the Roman empire could furniſh. He built a bridge upwards of three miles in the ſea; and would perhaps have ſhown himſelf more tyrannical, had not Chæreas, one of his ſervants, formed a conſpiracy againſt his life, with others equally tired with the cruelties and the inſults that were offered with impunity to the perſons and feelings of the Romans. In conſequence of this, the tyrant was murdered January 24, in his 29th year, after a reign of three years and ten months, A. D. 41. It has been ſaid, that Caligula wrote a treatiſe on rhetoric; but his love of learning is better underſtood from his attempts to deſtroy the writings of Homer and of Virgil. *Dio.—Sueton in vitâ—Tacit. Cambunii, mountains of Macedonia. Liv. 42, c. 53.

Cambўses, king of Perſia, was ſon of Cyrus the Great. He conquered Egypt, and was ſo offended at the ſuperſtition of the Egyptians, that he killed their god Apis, and plundered their temples. When he wiſhed to take Peluſium, he placed at the head of his army, a number of cats and dogs; and the Egyptians, refuſing to kill their dogs, in attempting to defend themſelves, became an eaſy prey to the enemy. Cambyſes afterwards ſent an army of 50,000 men to deſtroy Jupiter Ammon's temple, and reſolved to attack the Carthaginians and Æthiopians. He killed his brother Smerdis from mere ſuſpicion, and flea'd alive a partial judge, whoſe ſkin he nailed on the judgment ſeat, and appointed his ſon to ſucceed him, telling him to remember where he ſat. He died of a ſmall wound he had given himſelf with his ſword as he mounted on horſeback; and the Egyptians obſerved, that it was the ſame place on which he had wounded their god Apis, and that therefore he was viſited by the hand of the gods. His death happened 521 years before Chriſt. He left no iſſue to ſucceed him, and his throne was uſurped by the magi, and aſcended by Darius ſoon after. Herodot. 2. 3, &c.—Juſtin. 1, c. 9.—Val. Max. 6, c. 3.——A Perſian of obſcure origin, to whom king Aſtyages gave his daughter Mandane in marriage. The king, who had been terrified by dreams which threatened the loſs of his crown by the hand of his daughter's ſon, had taken this ſtep in hopes that the children of ſo ignoble a bed would ever remain in obſcurity. He was diſappointed. Cyrus, Mandane's ſon, dethroned him when grown to manhood. Herodot. 1, c. 46, 107, &c. —Juſtin. 1, c. 4.——A river of Aſia, which flows from mount Caucaſus into the Cyrus. Mela. 3, c. 5.

Camertes, a friend of Turnus, killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 562.

Camilla, queen of the Volſci, was daughter of Metablus and Caſmilla. She was educated in the woods, inured to the labors of hunting, and fed upon the milk of mares. Her father dedicated her, when young, to the ſervice of Diana. When ſhe was declared queen, ſhe marched to aſſiſt Turnus againſt Æneas, where ſhe ſignalized herſelf by the numbers that periſhed by her hand. She was ſo ſwift that ſhe could run, or rather fly over a field of corn without bending the blades, and make her way over the ſea without wetting her feet. She died by a wound ſhe received from Aruns. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 803, l. 11, v. 435.

Camilli & Camillæ, the prieſts inſtituted by Romulus for the ſervice of the gods.

Camillus, (L. Furius) a celebrated Roman, called a ſecond Romulus, from his ſervices to his country. He was baniſhed by the people for diſtributing, contrary to his vow, the ſpoils he had obtained at Veii. During his exile, Rome was beſieged by the Gauls under Brennus. In the midſt of their misfortunes, the beſieged Romans elected him dictator, and he forgot their ingratitude, and marched to the relief of his country, which he delivered, after it had been for ſome time in the poſſeſſion of the enemy. He died in the 80th year of his age, B. C. 365, after he had been five times dictator, once cenſor, three times interrex, twice a military tribune, and obtained four triumphs. He conquered the Hernici, Volſci, Latini, & Etrurians, and diſſuaded his countrymen from their intentions of leaving Rome to reſide at Veii. When he beſieged Faliſci, he rejected with proper indignation, the offers of a ſchoolmaſter, who had betrayed into his hands the ſons of the moſt worthy citizens. Plut. in Vitâ.—Liv. 5.—Flor. 1. c. 13.—Diod. 14.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 825.——A name of Mercury.

Camīro & Clytia, two daughters of Pandarus of Crete. When their parents were dead, they were left to the care of Venus; who, with the other goddeſſes, brought them up with tenderneſs, and aſked Jupiter to grant them kind huſbands. Jupiter, to puniſh upon them the crime of their father, who was acceſſary to the impiety of Tantalus ordered the harpies to carry them away and deliver them to the furies. Pauſ. 10. c. 30.—Homer. Od. 20.

CAMPUS MARTIUS, a large plain at Rome, without the walls of the city, where the Roman youths performed their exerciſes, and learnt to wreſtle and box, to throw the diſcus, hurl the javelin, ride a horſe, drive a chariot, &c. The public aſſemblies were held there, and the officers of ſtate choſen, and audience given to foreign ambaſſadors. It was adorned with ſtatues, columns, arches, and porticoes, and its pleaſant ſituation made it very frequented. It was called Martius, becauſe dedicated to Mars. It was ſometimes called Tiberinus, from its cloſeneſs to the Tiber. It was given to the Roman people by a veſtal virgin; but they were deprived of it by Tarquin the Proud, who made it a private field, and ſowed corn in it. When Tarquin was driven from Rome, the people recovered it, and threw away into the Tiber, the corn which had grown there, deeming it unlawful for any man to eat of the produce of that land. The ſheaves which were thrown into the river ſtopped in a ſhallow ford, and by the accumulated collection of mud became firm ground, and formed an iſland, which was called the Holy Iſland, or the iſland of Æſculapius. Dead carcaſes were generally burnt in the Campus Martius. Strab. 5.—Liv. 2, c. 5, l. 6, c. 20.

CAPĪTOLIUM, a celebrated temple and citadel at Rome on the Tarpeian rock, the plan of which was made by Tarquin Priſcus. It was begun by Servius Tullius, finiſhed by Tarquin Superbus, and conſecrated by the conſul Horatius after the expulſion of the Tarquins from Rome. It was built upon four acres of ground; the front was adorned with three rows of pillars, and the other ſides with two. The aſcent to it from the ground, was by an hundred ſteps. The magnificence and richneſs of this temple are almoſt incredible. All the conſuls ſucceſſively made donations to the capitol, and Auguſtus beſtowed upon it at one time 2,000 pound weight of gold. Its threſholds were made of braſs, and its roof was gold. It was adorned with veſſels and ſhields of ſolid ſilver, with golden chariots, &c. It was burnt during the civil wars of Marius, and Sylla rebuilt it, and died before the dedication, which was performed by Q. Catulus. It was again deſtroyed in the troubles under Vitellius; and Veſpaſian, who endeavoured to repair it, ſaw it again in ruins at his death. Domitian raiſed it again, for the laſt time, and made it more grand and magnificent than any of his predeceſſors, and ſpent 12,000 talents in gilding it.—When they firſt dug for the foundations, they found a man's head called Tolius, ſound and entire in the ground, and from thence drew an omen of the future greatneſs of the Roman empire. The hill was from that circumſtance called Capitolium, a capite Toli. The conſuls and magiſtrates offered ſacrifices there, when they firſt entered upon their offices, and the proceſſion in triumphs was always conducted to the capitol. *Virg. CAPPĂDŌCIA, a country of Aſia Minor, between the Halys, the Euphrates, and the Euxine. It receives its name from the river Cappadox, which ſeparates it from Galatia. The inhabitants were called Syrians and Leuco-Syrians by the Greeks. They were of a dull and ſubmiſſive diſpoſition, and addicted to every vice, according to the ancients, who wrote this virulent epigram againſt them:

Vipera Cappadocem nocitura momordit; at illa
Guſtato periit ſanguine Cappadocis.

When they were offered their freedom and independence by the Romans, they refuſed it, and begged of them a king, and they received Ariobarzanes. It was ſome time after governed by a Roman proconſul. Tho' the ancients have ridiculed this country for the unfruitfulneſs of its ſoil, and the manners of its inhabitants, yet it can boaſt of the birth of the geographer Strabo, among other illuſtrious characters. The horſes of this country were in general eſteem, and with theſe they paid their tributes to the king of Perſia, while under his power, for want of money.—The kings of Cappadocia moſtly bore the name of Ariarathes. Horat. 1. ep. 6, v. 39.—Plin. 6, c. 3.—Curt. 3 & 4.—Strab. 11 & 16.—Herodot. 1, c. 73. l. 5, c. 49.—Mela. 1, c. 2. l. 3. c. 8.

He wrote on the rape of Proſerpine. Diod. 5.——Another of Athens.——Another of Naupactum.——A man of Rhegium, who expoſed his ſon Agathocles on account of ſome uncommon dreams during his wife's pregnancy. Agathocles was preſerved. Diod. 19.——An Athenian general, who laid waſte Peloponneſus in the time of Pericles. Id. 12.

CARCĪNUS, a conſtellation, the ſame as the Cancer. Lucan. 9, v. 536.

CARDACES, a people of Aſia Minor. Strab. 15.

CARDĂMŸLE, a town of Argos.

CARDIA, a town in the Thracian Cherſoneſus. Plin. 4, c. 11.

CARDŬCHI, a warlike nation of Media. Diod. 14.

CĀRES, a nation which inhabited Caria, and thought themſelves the original poſſeſſors of the country. They became ſo powerful that their country was not ſufficiently extenſive extensive to contain them all, upon which they seized the neighbouring islands of the Ægean sea. These islands were conquered by Minos king of Crete. Nelus son of Codrus, invaded their country, and slaughtered many of the inhabitants. In this calamity, the Carians, surrounded on every side by enemies, fortified themselves in the mountainous parts of the country, and, soon after, made themselves terrible by sea. They were anciently called Leleges. Herodot. 1, c. 146 & 171.—Paus. 1, c. 40.—Strab. 13.—Curt. 6, c. 3.—Justin. 13, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 725.

CARESA, an island of the Ægean sea, opposite Attica.

CARESSUS, a river of Troas.

CARFINIA, an immodest woman mentioned Juv. 2, v. 69.

CĀRIA, a country of Asia Minor, whose boundaries have been different in different ages. Generally speaking, it was at the south of Ionia, at the east and north of the Icarian sea, and at the west of Phrygia Major and Lycia. It has been called Phœnicia, because a Phœnician colony first settled there; and afterwards it received the name of Caria, from Car, a king who first invented the auguries of birds. The chief town was called Halicarnassus, where Jupiter was the chief deity. [Vid. Cares]—A port of Thrace. Mela. 2, c. 2.

CARIAS, a town of Peloponnesus.

CARIATE, a town of Bactriana, where Alexander imprisoned Callisthenes.

CARĪNA, a virgin of Caria, &c. Polyæn. 8.

CARĪNÆ, certain edifices at Rome, built in the manner of ships, which were in the temple of Tellus. Some suppose that it was a street in which Pompey's house was built. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 361.

CARINE, a town near the Caicus in Asia Minor. Herodot. 7, c 42.

CARĪNUS, (M. Aurelius) a Roman who attempted to succeed his father Carus as emperor. He was famous for his debaucheries and cruelties. Diocletian defeated him in Dalmatia. He was killed by a soldier whose wife he had debauched, A.D. 268.

CARISSANUM, a place of Italy near which Milo was killed. Plin. 2, c. 56.

CARISTUM, a town of Liguria.

CARMĀNIA, a country of Asia between Persia and India. Arrian.—Plin. 6, c. 25.

CARMĀNOR, a Cretan who purified Apollo of slaughter. Paus. 2, c. 30.

CARME, a nymph, daughter of Eubulus and mother of Britomartis by Jupiter. She was one of Diana's attendants. Paus. 2, c. 30.

CARMĒLUS, a god among the inhabitants of mount Carmel, situate between Syria and Judæa. Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 78.—Sueton. Vesp. 5.

CARMENTA & CARMENTIS, a prophetess of Arcadia, mother of Evander, with whom she came to Italy, and was received by king Faunus, about 60 years before the Trojan war. Her name was Nicostrata, and she received that of Carmentis from the wildness of her looks when giving oracles, as if carens mentis. She was the oracle of the people of Italy during her life, and after death she received divine honours. She had a temple at Rome, and the Greeks offered her sacrifices under the name of Themis. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 467, l. 6, v. 530.—Plut. in Romul.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 339.—Liv. 5, c. 47.

CARMENTĀLES, festivals at Rome in honor of Carmenta, celebrated the 11th of January near the Porta Carmentalis, below the capitol. This goddess was entreated to render the Roman matrons prolific, and their labors easy. Liv. 1, c. 7.

CARMENTĀLIS PORTA, one of the gates of Rome in the neighbourhood of the capitol. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 338.

CARMIDES, a Greek of an uncommon memory. Plin. 7, c. 24.

CARNA & CARDINEA, a goddess at Rome who presided over hinges, as also over the entrails of the human body. She was originally a nymph called Grane, whom Janus ravished, and, for the injury, he gave her the power of presiding over houses, and of removing all noxious birds from the doors. The Romans offered her beans, bacon, and vegetables, to represent the simplicity of their ancestors. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 101, &c.

CARNASIUS, a village of Messenia in Peloponnesus. Paus. 4, c. 33.

CARNEĂDES, a philosopher of Cyrene in Africa, founder of a sect called the third or new academy. The Athenians sent him with Diogenes the stoic and Critolaus the peripatetic, as ambassador to Rome, B.C. 155. The Roman youth was extremely fond of the company of these learned philosophers; and when Carneades, in a speech, had given an accurate and judicious dissertation upon justice, and in another speech confuted all the arguments he had advanced, and apparently given no existence to the virtue he had so much commended; a report prevailed all over Rome, that a Grecian was come, who had so captivated by his words the rising generation, that they forgot their usual amusements, and ran mad after philosophy. When this reached the ears of Cato the censor, he gave immediate audience to the Athenian ambassadors in the senate, and dismissed them in haste, expressing his apprehension of their corrupting the opinions of the Roman people, whose only profession, he sternly observed, was arms and war. Carneades denied that any thing could be perceived or understood in the world, and he was the first who introduced an universal suspension of assent. He died in in the 90th year of his age, B. C. 128. Cic. ad Attic. 12 ep. 23. de Orat. 1 & 2.—Plin. 7, c. 30.—Lactantius 5, c. 14.

CARNEIA, a festival observed in most of the Grecian cities, but more particularly at Sparta, where it was first instituted, about 675 B. C, in honor of Apollo surnamed Carneus. It lasted nine days, and was an imitation of the manner of living in camps among the ancients.

CARNION, a town of Laconia.——A river of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 34.

CARNUS, a prophet of Acarnania, from whom Apollo was called Carneus. Paus. 3, c. 13.

CARNŪTES, a people of Celtic Gaul. Cæs. bell. G. 6, c. 4.

CARPASIA & CARPASIUM, a town of Cyprus.

CARPĂTHUS, an island in the Mediterranean between Rhodes and Crete, now called Scapanto. It has given its name to a part of the neighbouring sea, then called the Carpathian sea, between Rhodes and Crete. Carpathus was at first inhabited by some Cretan soldiers of Minos. It was 20 miles in circumference, and was sometimes called Tetrapolis, from its four capital cities. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Herodot. 3, c. 45.—Diod. 5.—Strab. 10.

CARPIA, an ancient name of Tarteſſus. Paus. 6, c. 19.

CARPIS, a river of Myſia. Herodot.

CARPO, a daughter of Zephyrus, and one of the Seaſons. She was loved by Calamus, the ſon of Mæander, whom ſhe equally admired. She was drowned in the Mæander, and was changed by Jupiter into all ſorts of fruit. Paus. 9, c. 35.

CAROPHŌRA, a name of Ceres and Proſerpine in Tegea. Paus. 8, c. 53.

CARPOPHŌRUS, an actor greatly eſteemed by Domitian. Martial.—Juv. 6, v. 198.

CARRÆ & CARRHÆ, a town of Meſopotamia, near which Craſſus was killed. Lucan. 1, v. 105.

CARRĪNĀTES SECUNDUS, a poor, but ingenious rhetorician, who came from Athens to Rome, where the boldneſs of his expreſſions, eſpecially againſt tyrannical power, expoſed him to Caligula's reſentment, who baniſhed him. Juv. 7, v. 205.

CARRŪCA, a town of Spain. Hirt. Hiſp. 27.

CARSĔŌLI, a town of the Æqui. Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 683.

CARTALIAS, a town of Spain.

CARTEIA, a town of Spain, near the ſea of Gades.

CARTHÆA, a town in the iſland of Cea, whence the epithet Cartheius. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 368.

CARTHĀGINIENSES, the inhabitants of Carthage, a rich and commercial nation. Vid. Carthago.

CARTHĀGO, a celebrated city of Africa, the rival of Rome, and long the capital of the country, and miſtreſs of Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia. The preciſe time of its foundation is unknown, yet writers ſeem to agree that it was firſt built by Dido, about 869 years before the Chriſtian era, or, according to others 72, or 93 years before the foundation of Rome. This city and republic floriſhed for 737 years, and the time of its greateſt glory was under Annibal and Amilcar. During the firſt Punic war, it contained no leſs than 700,000 inhabitants. It maintained three famous wars againſt Rome, called the Punic wars, [Vid. Punicum Bellum.] in the 3d of which Carthage was totally deſtroyed by Scipio the ſecond Africanus, B. C. 147, and only 5000 perſons were found within the walls. It was 23 miles in circumference; and when it was ſet on fire by the Romans, it burned inceſſantly during 17 days. After the deſtruction of Carthage, Utica became powerful, and the Romans thought themſelves ſecure; and as they had no rival to diſpute with them in the field, they fell into indolence and inactivity. Cæſar planted a ſmall colony on the ruins of Carthage. Auguſtus ſent there 3000 men; and Adrian, after the example of his imperial predeceſſors, rebuilt part of it, which he called Adrianopolis. Carthage was conquered from the Romans by the arms of Genſeric, A. D. 439; and it was for more than a century the ſeat of the Vandal empire in Africa, and fell into the hands of the Saracens in the 7th century. The Carthaginians were governed as a republic, and had two perſons yearly choſen among them with regal authority. They were very ſuperſtitious, and generally offered human victims to their gods; an unnatural cuſtom, which their allies wiſhed them to aboliſh, but in vain. They bore the character of a faithleſs and treacherous people, and the proverb Punica fides is well known. Strab. 17.—Virg. Æn. 1, &c.—Mela. 1, &c.—Ptol. 4.—Juſtin.—Liv. 4, &c —Paterc. 1 & 2—Plut. in Annib. &c.—Cic.——NŎVA, a town built in Spain, on the coaſts of the Mediterranean, by Aſdrubal the Carthaginian general. It was taken by Scipio when Hanno ſurrendered himſelf after a heavy loſs. It now bears the name of Carthagena. Polyb. 10.—Liv. 26, c. 43, &c. Sil. 15, v. 220, &c.——A daughter of Hercules.

CARTHASIS, a Scythian, &c. Curt. 7, c. 7.

CARTHEA, a town of Cos. Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 9.

CARVILIUS, a king of Britain, who attacked Cæſar's naval ſtation by order of Caſſivelaunus, ſivelaunus, &c. Cæſ. bell. G. 5, c. 22.——Spurius, a Roman who made a large image of the breaſt plates taken from the Samnites, and placed it in the capitol. Plin. 34, c. 7.——The firſt Roman who divorced his wife, during the ſpace of above 600 years. This was for barrenneſs, B. C. 231. Dionyſ. Hal. 2.—Val. Max. 2, c. 1.

CARUS, a Roman emperor who ſucceeded Probus. He was a prudent and active general, conquered the Sarmatians, and continued the Perſian war which his predeceſſor had commenced. He reigned two years, and died on the banks of the Tigris, as he was going in an expedition againſt Perſia, A. D. 283. He made his two ſons, Carinus and Numerianus, Cæſars; and as his many virtues had promiſed the Romans happineſs, he was made a god after death. Eutrop.——One of thoſe who attempted to ſcale the rock Aornus, by order of Alexander. Curt. 8, c. 11.

CARYA, a country of Arcadia.——A city of Laconia. Pauſ. 3, c. 10.—Here a feſtival was obſerved in honor of Diana Caryatis. It was then uſual for virgins to meet at the celebration, and join in a certain dance, ſaid to have been firſt inſtituted by Caſtor and Pollux. When Greece was invaded by Xerxes, the Laconians did not appear before the enemy, for fear of diſpleaſing the goddeſs, by not celebrating her feſtival. At that time the peaſants aſſembled at the uſual place, and ſang paſtorals called Βουκολισμοι, from Βουκολος, a neatherd. From this circumſtance ſome ſuppoſe that Bucolics originated.

CARYÄTÆ, a people of Arcadia.

CARYSTIUS ANTIGONUS, an hiſtorian, &c. B. C. 248.

CARYSTUS, a maritime town on the ſouth of Eubœa. Stat. 2, v. 93.

CARYUM, a place of Laconia, where Ariſtomenes preſerved ſome virgins, &c. Pauſ. 4, c. 16.

CASCELLIUS AULUS, a lawyer of great merit in the Auguſtan age. Horat. Art. Poet. 371.

CASILĪNUM, a town of Campania.

CASĪNA & CASĪNUM, a town of Campania. Sil. 4, v. 227.

CASIUS, a mountain near the Euphrates.——Another beyond Peluſium, where Pompey's tomb was raiſed by Adrian. Jupiter, ſirnamed Caſius, had a temple there. Lucan. 8, v. 858.——Another in Syria, from whoſe top the ſun can be ſeen riſing, tho' it be ſtill the darkneſs of night at the bottom of the mountain. Plin. 5, c. 22.—Mela. 1 & 3.

CASMENÆ, a town built by the Syracuſans in Sicily. Thucyd. 6, c. 5.

CASMILLA, the mother of Camilla. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 543.

CASPĔRIA, wife of Rhœtus king of the Marrubii, committed adultery with her ſon-in-law. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 388.——A town of the Sabines. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 714.

CASPĔRŬLA, a town of the Sabines, Sil. 8, v. 416.

CASPIÆ PORTÆ, certain paſſes of Aſia, which ſome place about Caucaſus and the Caſpian ſea, and others between Perſia and the Caſpian ſea, or near mount Taurus, or Armenia, or Cilicia. Diod. 1. Plin. 5, c. 27. l. 6, c. 13.

CASPIANA, a country of Armenia.

CASPII, a Scythian nation near the Caſpian ſea. Such as had lived beyond their 70th year, were ſtarved to death. Their dogs were remarkable for their fierceneſs. Herodot. 3, c. 92, &c. l. 7, c. 67, &c.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 798.

CASPIUM MARE, or HYRCĀNUM, a large ſea in the form of a lake, which has no communication with other ſeas, and lies between the Caſpian and Hyrcanian mountains, to the north of Parthia. Its waters are ſweet. Ancient authors aſſure us, that it produced enormous ſerpents and fiſhes, different in color and kind from thoſe of all other waters. A number of rivers diſcharge themſelves into it. It is 800 miles long, and 650 broad. The eaſtern parts are more particularly called the Hyrcanian ſea, and the weſtern the Caſpian. It is now called the ſea of Sala or Baku. Herodot. 1, c. 202, &c.—Curt. 3, c. 2. l. 6, c. 4. l. 7, c. 3.—Strab. 11.—Mela. 1, c. 2. l. 3, c. 5 & 6.—Plin. 6, c. 13.—Dionyſ. Perieg. v. 50.

CASSANDĀNE, the mother of Cambyſes by Cyrus. Herodot. 2, c. 1. l. 3, c. 2.

CASSANDER, ſon of Antipater, made himſelf maſter of Macedonia after his father's death, where he reigned for 18 years. He married Theſſalonica, the ſiſter of Alexander, to ſtrengthen himſelf on his throne. Olympias, the mother of Alexander, wiſhed to keep the kingdom of Macedonia for Alexander's young children; and therefore ſhe deſtroyed the relations of Caſſander, who beſieged her in the town of Pydna, and put her to death. Roxane, with her ſon Alexander, and Barſena the mother of Hercules, both wives of Alexander, ſhared the fate of Olympias with their children. Antigonus, who had been for ſome time upon friendly terms with Caſſander, declared war againſt him; and Caſſander, to make himſelf equal with his adverſary, made a league with Lyſimachus and Seleucus, and obtained a memorable victory at Ipſus, B. C. 301. He died three years after this victory, of a dropſy. His ſon Antipater killed his mother; and for this unnatural murder, he was put to death by his brother Alexander, who, to ſtrengthen himſelf, invited Demetrius, the ſon of Antigonus, from from Aſia. Demetrius took advantage of the invitation, and put to death Alexander, and aſcended the throne of Macedonia. Pauſ. 1, c. 25.—Diod. 19.—Juſtin. 12, 13, &c.

CASSANDRA, daughter of Priam and Hecuba, was paſſionately loved by Apollo, who promiſed to grant her whatever ſhe might require, if ſhe would gratify his paſſion. She aſked the power of knowing futurity; and as ſoon as ſhe had received it, ſhe refuſed to perform her promiſe, and ſlighted Apollo. The god, in his diſappointment, wetted her lips with his tongue, and by this action effected that no credit or reliance ſhould ever be put upon her predictions, however true or faithful they might be. Some maintain that ſhe received the gift of prophecy with her brother Helenus, by being placed when young one night in the temple of Apollo, where ſerpents were found wreathed round their bodies, and licking their ears, which circumſtance gave them the knowledge of futurity. She was looked upon by the Trojans as inſane, and ſhe was even confined, and her predictions were diſregarded. She was courted by many princes during the Trojan war. When Troy was taken, ſhe fled for ſhelter to the temple of Minerva, where Ajax found her, and offered her violence, with the greateſt cruelty, at the foot of Minerva's ſtatue. In the diviſion of the ſpoils of Troy, Agamemnon, who was enamoured of her, took her as his wife, and returned with her to Greece. She repeatedly foretold to him the ſudden calamities that awaited his return; but he gave no credit to her, and was aſſaſſinated by his wife Clytemneſtra. Caſſandra ſhared his fate, and ſaw all her prophecies but too truly fulfilled. [Vid. Agamemnon.] Æſchyl. in Agam.—Homer. Il. 13, v. 363. Od. 4.—Hygin. fab. 117.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 246, &c.—Q. Calab. 13, v. 421.—Eurip. in Troad.—Pauſ. 1, c. 16. l. 3, c. 19.

CASSANDRIA, a town of Elis, formerly called Potidæa. Pauſ. 5, c. 23.

CASSIA LEX was enacted by Caſſius Longinus, A. U. C. 649. By it no man condemned or deprived of military power was permitted to enter the ſenate-houſe.——Another enacted by C. Caſſius, the pretor, to chuſe ſome of the plebeians to be admitted among the patricians.——Another A. U. C. 616, to make the ſuffrages of the Roman people free and independent. It ordained that they ſhould be received upon tablets. Cic. in Læl.——Another, A. U. C. 267, to make a diviſion of the territories taken from the Hernici, half to the Roman people, and half to the Latins.——Another, enacted A. U. C. 596, to grant a conſular power to P. Anicius and Octavius on the day they triumphed over Macedonia. Liv.

CASSIÖPE & CASSIÖPEA, married Cepheus, king of Æthiopia, by whom ſhe had Andromeda. She boaſted herſelf to be fairer than the Nereides; upon which Neptune, at the requeſt of theſe deſpiſed nymphs, puniſhed the inſolence of Caſſiope, and ſent a huge ſea monſter to ravage Æthiopia. The wrath of Neptune could be appeaſed only by expoſing Andromeda, whom Caſſiope tenderly loved, to the fury of a ſea monſter; and juſt as ſhe was going to be devoured, Perſeus delivered her. [Vid. Andromeda.] Caſſiope was made a ſouthern conſtellation, conſiſting of 13 ſtars called Caſſiope. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 43.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 738.—Hygin. fab. 64.—Propert. 1, el. 17, v. 3—Manilius. 1.——A city of Epirus near Theſprotia.——Another in the iſland of Corcyra. Plin. 4, c. 12.

CASSITĔRĬDES, iſlands in the weſtern ocean, where tin was found, ſuppoſed to be the Scilly iſlands of the moderns. Plin. 4, c. 22.

CASSIVELAUNUS, a Briton inveſted with ſovereign authority when J. Cæſar made a deſcent upon Britain. Cæſ. bell. G. 5, c. 19, &c.

C. CASSIUS, a celebrated Roman, who made himſelf known by being firſt quæſtor to Craſſus in his expedition againſt Parthia, from which he extricated himſelf with uncommon addreſs. He followed the intereſt of Pompey; and when Cæſar had obtained the victory in the plains of Pharſalia, Caſſius was one of thoſe who owed their life to the mercy of the conqueror. He married Junia the ſiſter of Brutus, and with him he reſolved to murder the man to whom he was indebted for his life, on account of his oppreſſive ambition; and before he ſtabbed Cæſar, he addreſſed himſelf to the ſtatue of Pompey, who had fallen by the avarice of him he was going to aſſaſſinate. When the provinces were divided among Cæſar's murderers, Caſſius received Africa; and when his party had loſt ground at Rome, by the ſuperior influence of Auguſtus and M. Antony, he retired to Philippi, with his friend Brutus and their adherents. In the battle that was fought, the wing which Caſſius commanded was defeated, and his camp was plundered. In this unſucceſsful moment he ſuddenly gave up all hopes of recovering from his loſs, and concluded that Brutus was conquered and ruined as well as himſelf. Fearful to fall into the enemy's hands, he ordered one of his freed-men to run him through, and he periſhed by that very ſword which had given a wound to Cæſar. His body was honored with a magnificent funeral by his friend Brutus, who declared over him that he deſerved to be called the laſt of the Romans. If he was brave, he was equally learned. Some of his letters are ſtill extant among Cicero's epiſtles. He was a ſtrict follower of the doctrine of Epicurus. He was often too raſh and too violent, and many of the wrong ſteps which Brutus took are to be aſcribed to the prevailing advice of Caſſius. He is allowed by Paterculus to have been a better commander than Brutus, though a leſs ſincere friend. The day after Cæſar's murder he dined at the houſe of Antony, who aſked him whether he had then a dagger concealed in his boſom; yes, replied he, if you aſpire to tyranny. Suet. in Cæſ. & Aug.—Plut. in Brut. & Cæſ.—Patercul. 2, c. 46.—Dio. 40.——A Roman citizen, who condemned his ſon to death, on pretence of his raiſing commotions in the ſtate. Val. Max. 5, c. 8.——A tribune of the people, who made many laws tending to diminiſh the influence of the Roman nobility. He was competitor with Cicero for the conſulſhip.——One of Pompey's officers, who, during the civil wars, revolted to Cæſar with 10 ſhips.——A poet of Parma, of great genius. He was killed by Varus, by order of Auguſtus, whom he had offended by his ſatyrical writings. His fragments of Orpheus were found and edited ſome time after by the poet Statius. Horat. 1, ſat. 10, v. 62.——Spurius, a Roman, put to death on ſuſpicion of his aſpiring to tyranny, after he had been three times conſul, B. C. 485. Diod. 11.—Val. Max. 6, c. 3.——Brutus, a Roman who betrayed his country to the Latins, and fled to the temple of Pallas, where his father confined him, and he was ſtarved to death.——Longinus, an officer of Cæſar in Spain, much diſliked. Cæſ. Alex. c. 48.——A conſul to whom Tiberius married Druſilla, daughter of Germanicus. Suet. in Cal. c. 57——A lawyer whom Nero put to death becauſe he bore the name of J. Cæſar's murderer. Suet. in Ner. 37.——L. Hemina, the moſt ancient writer of annals at Rome. He lived A. U. C. 608.——Longinus, a critic. Vid. Longinus.——Lucius, a conſul with C. He died in exile, in his 25th year. Vid. Severus.

CASSŌTIS, a nymph and fountain of Phocis. Pauſ. 10, c. 24.

CASTABALA, a city of Cilicia, whoſe inhabitants made war with their dogs. Plin. 8, c. 40.

CASTABUS, a town of Cherſoneſus.

CASTĂLIA, a town near Phocis.——A daughter of the Achelous.

CASTĂLIUS FONS, or CASTALIA, a fountain of Parnaſſus ſacred to the muſes. The waters of this fountain were cool and excellent; they had the power of inſpiring thoſe that drank of them with the true fire of poetry. The muſes have received the ſirname of Caſtalides from this fountain. Virg. G. 3, v. 293.—Martial. 12, ep. 3.

CASTANEA, a town near the Peneus.

CASTIANIRA, a miſtreſs of Priam.

CASTOR & POLLUX, were twin brothers, ſons of Jupiter, by Leda, the wife of Tyndarus, king of Sparta. The manner of their birth is uncommon. Jupiter, who was enamoured of Leda, changed himſelf into a beautiful ſwan, and deſired Venus to metamorphoſe herſelf into an eagle. After this tranſformation the goddeſs purſued the god with apparent ferocity, and Jupiter fled for refuge into the arms of Leda, who was bathing in the Eurotas. Jupiter took advantage of his ſituation, and nine months after, Leda, who was already pregnant, brought forth two eggs, from one of which came Pollux and Helena; and from the other, Caſtor and Clytemneſtra. The two former were the offſpring of Jupiter, and the latter were believed to be the children of Tyndarus. Some ſuppoſe that Leda brought forth only one egg, from which Caſtor and Pollux ſprung. Mercury, immediately after their birth, carried them to Pallena, where they were educated; and as ſoon as they had arrived to years of maturity, they embarked with Jaſon to go in queſt of the golden fleece. In this expedition both behaved with ſuperior courage: Pollux conquered and ſlew Amycus, in the combat of the Ceſtus, and was ever after reckoned the god and patron of boxing and wreſtling. Caſtor diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the management of horſes. The brothers cleared the Helleſpont, and the neighbouring ſeas, from pirates, after their return from Colchis, from which circumſtance they have been always deemed the friends of navigation. During the Argonautic expedition, in a violent ſtorm, two flames of fire were ſeen to play around the heads of the ſons of Leda, and immediately the tempeſt ceaſed, and the ſea was calmed. From this occurrence their power to protect ſailors has been more firmly credited, and the two mentioned fires, which are very common in ſtorms, have ſince been known by the name of Caſtor and Pollux; and when they both appeared, it was a ſign of fair weather; but if only one was ſeen, it prognoſticated ſtorms, and the aid of Caſtor and Pollux was conſequently ſolicited. They made war againſt the Athenians to recover their ſiſter Helen, whom Theſeus had carried away; and from their clemency to the conquered, quered, they acquired the ſirname of Anaces, or benefactors. They were initiated in the ſacred myſteries of the Cabiri, and in thoſe of Ceres of Eleuſis. They were invited to a feaſt when Lynceus and Idas were going to celebrate their marriage with Phœbe and Talaira, the daughters of Leucippus, who was brother to Tyndarus. Their behavior after this invitation was cruel. They became enamoured of the two women whoſe nuptials they were to celebrate, and reſolved to carry them away and marry them. This violent ſtep provoked Lynceus and Idas: a battle enſued, and Caſtor killed Lynceus, and was killed by Idas. Pollux revenged the death of his brother, by killing Idas; and as he was immortal, and tenderly attached to his brother, he entreated Jupiter to reſtore him to life, or to deprive him himſelf of immortality. Jupiter permitted Caſtor to ſhare the immortality of his brother; and conſequently, as long as the one was upon earth, ſo long was the other detained in the infernal regions, and they alternately lived and died every day; or, according to others, every ſix months. This act of fraternal love Jupiter rewarded by making the two brothers conſtellations in heaven, under the name of Gemini, which never appear together, but when one riſes the other ſets, and ſo on alternately. Caſtor made Talaira mother of Anogon, and Phœbe had Mneſileus by Pollux. They received divine honors after death, and were generally called Dioſcuri, ſons of Jupiter. White lambs were more particularly offered on their altars, and the ancients were fond of ſwearing by the divinity of the Dioſcuri, by the expreſſions of Ædepol and Ædaſtor. Among the Romans there prevailed many public reports, at different times, that Caſtor and Pollux had made their appearance to the Roman armies; and, mounted on white ſteeds, had marched at the head of their troops, and furiouſly attacked the enemy. Their ſirnames were many, and they were generally repreſented mounted on two white horſes, armed with ſpears, and riding ſide by ſide, with their head covered with a bonnet, on whoſe top glittered a ſtar. *Ovid. L. Sergius Catilina, a celebrated Roman, deſcended of a noble family. When he had ſquandered away his fortune by his debaucheries and extravagance, and been refuſed the conſulſhip, he ſecretly meditated the ruin of his country, and conſpired with many of the moſt illuſtrious of the Romans, as diſſolute as himſelf, to extirpate the ſenate, plunder the treaſures, and ſet Rome on fire. This conſpiracy was timely diſcovered by the conſul Cicero, whom he had reſolved to murder; and Catiline, after he had declared his intentions in the full ſenate, and attempted to vindicate himſelf, on ſeeing five of his accomplices arreſted, retired to Gaul, where his partizans were aſſembling an army; while Cicero, at Rome, puniſhed the condemned conſpirators. Petreius, the other conſul's lieutenant, attacked Catiline's ill diſciplined troops, and routed them. Catiline was killed in the engagement, bravely fighting, about the middle of December, B. C. 63. His character has been deſervedly branded with the foulest infamy; and to the violence he offered to a veſtal, he added the more atrocious murder of his own brother, for which he would have ſuffered death, had not friends and bribes prevailed over juſtice. It has been reported that Catiline and the other conſpirators drank human blood, to make their oaths more firm and inviolable. Salluſt has written an account of the conſpiracy. Cic. in Catil.—*Virg. M. CATIUS, an epicurean philoſopher of Inſubria, who wrote a treatiſe, in four books, on the nature of things, and the ſummum bonum, and an account of the doctrine and tenets of Epicurus. But as he was not a ſound or faithful follower of the Epicurean philoſophy, he has been ridiculed by Horat. 2, Sat. 4.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.

CATIZI, a people of the Pygmæans, ſuppoſed to have been driven from their country by cranes. Plin. 4, c. 11.

CATO, a ſirname of the Porcian family, rendered illuſtrious by M. Porcius Cato, a celebrated Roman, afterwards called Cenſorius, from his having exerciſed the office of cenſor. He roſe to all the honors of the ſtate, and the firſt battle he ever ſaw was againſt Annibal, at the age of ſeventeen, where he behaved with uncommon valor. In his quæſtorſhip, under Africanus, againſt Carthage, and in his expedition in Spain, againſt the Celtiberians, and in Greece, he diſplayed equal proofs of his courage and prudence. He was remarkable for his love of temperance; he never drank but water, and was always ſatisfied with whatever meats were laid upon his table by his ſervants, whom he never reproved with an angry word. During his cenſorſhip, which he obtained, though he had made many declarations of his future ſeverity if ever in office, he behaved with the greateſt rigor and impartiality, ſhewed himſelf an enemy to all luxury and diſſipation, and even accuſed his colleague of embezzling the public money. He is famous for the great oppoſition which he made againſt the introduction of the finer arts of Greece into Italy, and his treatment of Carneades is well known. This prejudice aroſe from an apprehenſion that the learning and luxury of Athens would deſtroy the valor and ſimplicity of the Roman people; and he often obſerved to his ſon, that the Romans would be certainly ruined whenever they began to be infected with Greek. It appears, however, that he changed his opinion, and made himſelf remarkable for the knowledge of Greek, which he acquired in his old age. He himſelf educated his ſon, and inſtructed him in writing and grammar. He taught him dexterouſly to throw a javelin, and inured him to the labors of the field, and to bear cold and heat with the ſame indifference, and to ſwim acroſs the moſt rapid rivers with eaſe and boldneſs. He was univerſally deemed ſo ſtrict in his morals, that Virgil makes him one of the judges of hell. He repented only of three things during his life; to have gone by ſea when he could go by land, to have paſſed a day inactive, and to have told a ſecret to his wife. A ſtatue was raiſed to his memory, and he diſtinguiſhed himſelf as much for his knowledge of agriculture as his political life. In Cicero's age there were 150 orations of his, beſides letters, and a celebrated work called Origines, of which the firſt book gave an hiſtory of the Roman monarchy; the ſecond and third an account of the neighbouring cities of Italy; the fourth a detail of the firſt, and the fifth of the ſecond Punic war; and in the others the Roman hiſtory was brought down to the war of the Luſitanians, carried on by Ser. Galba. Some fragments of the Origines remain, ſuppoſed, by ſome, to be ſuppoſitious. Cato's treatiſe, De re ruſticâ, was edited by Auſon. Pompna, 8vo. Ant. Plant. 1590; but the beſt edition of Cato, &c. ſeems to be Geſner's, 2 vols. 4to. Lipſ. 1735. Cato died in an extreme old age, about 150 B. C.; and Cicero, to ſhew his reſpect for him, has introduced him in his treatiſe on old age, as the principal character. Plutarch & C. Nepos have written an account of his life. Cic. Acad. & de Senect. &c.——Marcus, the ſon of the cenſor, married the daughter of P. Æmylius. He loſt his ſword in a battle, and, though wounded and tired, he went to his friends, and, with their aſſiſtance, renewed newed the battle, and recovered his ſword. Plut. in Cat.——A courageous Roman, grandfather to Cato the cenſor. He had five horſes killed under him in battles. Plut. in Cat.——Valerius, a grammarian in the time of Sylla, who inſtructed at Rome many noble pupils, and wrote ſome poems. Ovid. 2, Triſt. 1, v. 436.——Marcus, ſirnamed Uticenſis, from his death at Utica, was great grandſon to the cenſor of the ſame name. The early virtues that appeared in his childhood, ſeemed to promiſe a great man; and at the age of fourteen, he earneſtly aſked his preceptor for a ſword, to ſtab the tyrant Sylla. He was auſtere in his morals, and a ſtrict follower of the tenets of the Stoics: he was careleſs of his dreſs, often appeared barefooted in public, and never travelled but on foot. He was ſuch a lover of diſcipline, that in whatever office he was employed, he always reformed its abuſes, and reſtored the ancient regulations. When he was ſet over the troops, in the capacity of a commander, his removal was univerſally lamented, and deemed almoſt a public loſs by his affectionate ſoldiers. His fondneſs for candor was ſo great, that the veracity of Cato became proverbial. In his viſits to his friends, he wiſhed to give as little moleſtation as poſſible; and the importuning civilities of king Dejotarus ſo diſpleaſed him, when he was at his court, that he haſtened to retire from him. He was very jealous of the ſafety and liberty of the republic, and watched carefully over the conduct of Pompey, whoſe power and influence was great. He often expreſſed his diſlike to ſerve the office of a tribune; but when he ſaw a man of corrupted principles apply for it, he offered himſelf a candidate to oppoſe him, and obtained the tribuneſhip. In the conſpiracy of Catiline, he ſupported Cicero, and was the chief cauſe that the conſpirators were capitally puniſhed. When the provinces of Gaul were voted for five years to Cæſar, Cato obſerved to the ſenators, that they had introduced a tyrant into the capitol. He was ſent to Cyprus againſt Ptolemy, who had rebelled, by his enemies, who hoped that the difficulty of the expedition would injure his reputation. But his prudence extricated him from every danger. Ptolemy ſubmitted, and after a ſucceſsful campaign, Cato was received at Rome with the moſt diſtinguiſhing honors, which he, however, modeſtly declined. When the firſt triumvirate was formed between Cæſar, Pompey, and Craſſus, Cato oppoſed them with all his might, and with independent ſpirit foretold to the Roman people all the miſfortunes which ſoon after followed. After repeated applications he was made pretor, but he ſeemed rather to diſgrace the dignity of that office by the meanneſs of his dreſs. He applied for the conſulſhip, but could never obtain it. When Cæſar had paſſed the Rubicon, Cato adviſed the Roman ſenate to deliver the care of the republic into the hands of Pompey; and when his advice had been complied with, he followed him with his ſon to Dyrrachium, where, after a ſmall victory there, he was entruſted with the care of the ammunitions, and of 15 cohorts. After the battle of Pharſalia, Cato took the command of the Corcyrean fleet; and when he heard of Pompey's death, on the coaſt of Africa, he traverſed the deſarts of Libya, to join himſelf to Scipio. He refuſed to take the command of the army in Africa, a circumſtance of which he afterwards repented. When Scipio had been defeated, partly for not paying regard to Cato's advice, Cato fortified himſelf in Utica, but, however no with the intentions of ſupporting a ſiege. When Cæſar approached near the city, Cato diſdained to fly, and, rather than fall alive into the conqueror's hands, he ſtabbed himſelf, after he read Plato's treatiſe on the immortality of the ſoul, B. C. 46, in the 59th year of his age. He had firſt married Attilia, a woman whoſe licentious conduct obliged him to divorce her. Afterwards he united himſelf to Martia, daughter of Philip. Hortenſius, his friend, wiſhed to raiſe children by Martia, and therefore obtained her from Cato. After the death of Hortenſius, Cato took her again. This conduct was ridiculed by the Romans, who obſerved that Martia had entered the houſe of Hortenſius very poor, but returned to the bed of Cato loaded with treaſures. It was obſerved that Cato always appeared in mourning, and never laid himſelf down at his meals ſince the defeat of Pompey, but always ſat down, contrary to the cuſtom of the Romans, as if depreſſed with the recollection that the ſupporters of republican liberty were decaying. Plutarch has written an account of his life. Lucan. 1, v. 128, &c.—*Val. CATULLUS, C. or Q. VALERIUS, a poet of Verona, whoſe compoſitions, elefant and ſimple, are the offſpring of a luxuriant imagination. He was acquainted with the moſt diſtinguiſhed people of his age, and directed his ſatyr againſt Cæſar, whoſe only revenge was to invite the poet to a good ſupper. Catullus was the firſt Roman, who imitated with ſucceſs the Greek writers, and introduced their numbers among the Latins. Though the pages of the poet are occaſionally diſfigured with licentious expreſſions, the whole is written with great purity of ſtile. Catullus died in the 46th year of his age, B. C. 40. The beſt editions of his works, which conſiſt only of epigrams, are that of Vulpius, 4to. Patavii, 1737, and that of Barbou, 12mo. Caucăsus, a celebrated mountain between the Euxine and Caſpian ſeas, which may be conſidered as the continuation of the ridge of mount Taurus. Its height is immenſe. It was inhabited anciently by various ſavage nations who lived upon the wild fruits of the earth. It was covered with ſnow in ſome parts, and in others it was variegated with fruitful orchards and plantations. The inhabitants formerly were ſuppoſed to gather gold on the ſhores of their rivulets in ſheep ſkins, but now they live without making uſe of money. Prometheus was tied on the top of Caucaſus by Jupiter, and continually devoured by vultures, according to ancient authors. The paſſes near this mountain, called Caucaſiæ portæ, bear now the name of Derbent. Herodot. 4, c. 203, &c.—Virg. Ecl. 6, G. 2, v. 440.—Flacc. 5, v. 155.

He was a particular friend of Cicero, with whom he correſponded. Some of his letters are ſtill extant in Cicero. Plin. 10, c. 24.—Cic. 15, ep. 66. Orat. 29.——A ſcribe of Octavius Cæſar. Cic. 16, ad Attic. ep. 8.——A conſular man ſuſpected of conſpiracy, and murdered by Titus, after an invitation to ſupper. Suet. in Tit. c. 6.

CECRŎPIA, the original name of Athens, in honor of Cecrops, its firſt founder. The ancients often uſe this word for Attica, and the Athenians are often called Cecropidæ. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 21.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 671.—Lucan. 3, v. 306.

CECRŎPIDÆ, an ancient name of the Athenians, more particularly applied to thoſe who were deſcended from Cecrops the founder of Athens. The honorable name of Cecropidæ was often conferred as a reward for ſome virtuous action in the field of battle. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 21.

CECROPS, a native of Sais in Egypt, who led a colony to Attica about 1556 years before the chriſtian era, and reigned over part of the country which was called from him Cecropia. He ſoftened and poliſhed the rude and uncultivated manners of the inhabitants, and drew them from the country to inhabit 12 ſmall villages which he had founded. He gave them laws and regulations, and introduced among them the worſhip of thoſe deities which were held in adoration in Egypt. He married the daughter of Actæus a Grecian prince, and was deemed the firſt founder of Athens. He taught his ſubjects to cultivate the olive, and inſtructed them to look upon Minerva as the watchful patroneſs of their city. It is ſaid that he was the firſt who raiſed an altar to Jupiter in Greece, and offered him ſacrifices. After a reign of 50 years, ſpent in regulating his newly formed kingdom, and in poliſhing the minds of his ſubjects, Cecrops died, leaving three daughters, Aglauros, Herſe, and Pandroſos. He was ſucceeded by Cranaus, a native of the country. Some time after, Theſeus, one of his ſucceſſors on the throne, formed the twelve villages which he had eſtabliſhed, into one city, to which the name of Athens was given. [Vid. Athenæ.] Some authors have deſcribed Cecrops as a monſter, half a man and half a ſerpent; and this fable is explained by the recollection that he was maſter of two languages, the Greek and Egyptian; or that he had the command over two countries, Egypt and Greece. Others explain it by an alluſion to the regulations which Cecrops made amongſt the inhabitants concerning marriage and the union of the two ſexes. Pauſ. 1, c. 5.—Strab. 9.—Juſtin. 2. c. 6.—Herodot. 8, c. 44.—Apollod. 3, c. 14.—*Ovid. CELTÆ. a name given to the nation that inhabited the country between the Ocean and the Palus Mæotis, according to ſome authors mentioned by Plut. in Mario. This name, though anciently applied to the inhabitants of Gaul, as well as of Germany and Spain, was more particularly given to a part of the Gauls, whoſe country, called Gallia Celtica, was ſituate between the rivers Sequana and Garumna, modernly called la Seine and la Garonne. The Celtæ ſeemed to receive their name from Celtus, a ſon of Hercules or of Polyphemus. The promontory which bore the name of Celticum, is now called Cape Finiſterre. Cæſ. bell. G. 1, c. 1. &c.—Mela. 3, c. 2.—Herodot. 4, c. 49.

CELTĪBERI, a people of Spain, deſcended from the Celtæ. They ſettled near the Iberus, and added the name of the river to that of their nation, and were afterwards called Celtiberi. They made ſtrong head againſt the Romans and Carthaginians when they invaded their country. Their country is called Celtiberia. Flor. 2, c. 17.—Strab. 4.—Lucan. 4, v. 10.

Censores, two magiſtrates of great authority at Rome, firſt created, B. C. 443. Their office was to number the people, eſtimate the poſſeſſions of every citizen, reform and watch over the manners of the people, and regulate the taxes. Their power was alſo extended over private families; they puniſhed irregularity, and inſpected the management and education of the Roman youth. They could inquire into the expences of every citizen, and even degrade a ſenator from all his privileges and honors, if guilty of any extravagance. This puniſhment was generally executed in paſſing over the offender's name in calling the liſt of the ſenators. The office of public cenſor was originally exerciſed by the kings. Servius Tullius, the ſixth king of Rome, firſt eſtabliſhed a cenſus, by which every man was obliged to come to be regiſtered, and give in writing the place of his reſidence, his name, his quality, the number of his children, of his tenants, eſtates, and domeſtics, &c. The ends of the cenſus were very ſalutary to the Roman republic. They knew their own ſtrength, their ability to ſupport a war, or to make a levy of troops, or raiſe a tribute. It was required that every knight ſhould be poſſeſſed of 400,000 ſeſterces, to enjoy the rights and privileges of his order; and a ſenator was entitled to ſit in the ſenate, if he was really worth 800,000 ſeſterces. This laborious taſk of numbering and reviewing the people, was, after the expulſion of the Tarquins, one of the duties and privileges of the conſuls. But when the republic was become more powerful, and when the number of its citizens was increaſed, the conſuls were found unable to make the cenſus, on account of the multiplicity of buſineſs. After it had been neglected for 16 years, two new magiſtrates called cenſors were elected. They remained in office for five years, and every fifth year they made a cenſus of all the citizens in the campus martius, and offered a ſolemn ſacrifice, and made a luſtration in the name of all the Roman people. This ſpace of time was called a luſtrum, and ten or twenty years were commonly expreſſed by two or four luſtra. After the office of the cenſors had remained for ſome time unaltered, the Romans, jealous of their power, abridged the time of their exiſtence, and a law was made, A. U. C. 440, by Mamercus Æmilius, to limit the time of the cenſorſhip to 18 months. After the ſecond Punic war, they were always choſen from ſuch perſons as had been conſuls; their office was more honorable, though leſs powerful, than that of the conſuls; the badges of their office were the ſame, but the cenſors were not allowed to have lictors to walk before them as the conſuls. When one of the cenſors died, no one was elected in his room till the five years were expired, and his colleague immediately reſigned. This circumſtance originated from the death of a cenſor before the ſack of Rome by Brennus, and was ever after deemed an unfortunate event to the republic. The emperors aboliſhed the cenſors, and took upon themſelves to execute their office.

Censorinus, Ap. Cl. was compelled, after many ſervices to the ſtate, to aſſume the imperial purple by the ſoldiers, by whom he was murdered ſome days after, A. D. 270.——Martius, a conſul, to whom, as a particular friend, Horace addreſſed his 4 od. 8.——A grammarian of the third century, whoſe book, De die natali, is extant, beſt edited in 8vo, by Haverkamp, L. Bat. 1767. It treats of the birth of man, of years, months, and days.

Census, the numbering of the people at Rome, performed by the cenſors; a cenſeo, to value. Vid. Cenſores.——A god worſhipped at Rome, the ſame as Conſus.

Centarētus, a Galatian, who when Antiochus was killed, mounted his horſe in the greateſt exultation. The horſe, as if conſcious of diſgrace, immediately leaped down a precipice, and killed himſelf and his rider. Plin. 8, c. 42.

Centauri, a people of Theſſaly, half men and half horſes. They were the offſpring of Centaurus, ſon of Apollo, by Stilbia, daughter of the Peneus. According to ſome, the Centaurs were the fruit of Ixion's adventure with the cloud in the ſhape of Juno, or, as others aſſert, of the union of Centaurus with the mares of Magneſia. This fable of the exiſtence of the Centaurs, monſters ſupported upon the four legs of a horſe, ariſes from the ancient people of Theſſaly having tamed horſes, and having appeared to their neighbours mounted on horſeback, a ſight very uncommon at that time, and which, when at a diſtance, ſeems only one body, and conſequently one creature. Some derive the name απο των κεντειν ταυρους, goading bulls, becauſe they went on horſeback after their bulls which had ſtrayed, or becauſe they hunted wild bulls with horſes. Some of the ancients have maintained, that monſters like the Centaurs can have exiſted in the natural courſe of of things. Plutarch in Sympoſ. mentions one ſeen by Periander tyrant of Corinth; and Pliny 7, c. 3, ſays, that he ſaw one embalmed in honey, which had been brought to Rome from Egypt in the reign of Claudius. The battle of the Centaurs with the Lapithæ is famous in hiſtory. Ovid has elegantly deſcribed it, and it has alſo employed the pen of Heſiod, Valerius Flaccus, &c. and Pauſanias in Eliac. ſays, it was repreſented in the temple of Jupiter at Olympia, and alſo at Athens by Phidias and Parrhaſius according to Pliny 36, c. 5. The origin of this battle was a quarrel at the marriage of Hippodamia with Pirithous, where the Centaurs, intoxicated with wine, behaved with rudeneſs, and even offered violence to the women that were preſent. Such an inſult irritated Hercules, Theſeus, and the reſt of the Lapithæ, who defended the women, wounded and defeated the Centaurs, and obliged them to leave their country, and retire to Arcadia. Here their inſolence was a ſecond time puniſhed by Hercules, who, when he was going to hunt the boar of Erymanthus, was kindly entertained by the Centaur Pholus, who gave him wine which belonged to the reſt of the Centaurs, but had been given them on condition of their treating Hercules with it, whenever he paſſed through their territory. They reſented the liberty which Hercules took with their wine, and attacked him with uncommon fury. The hero defended himſelf with his arrows, and defeated his adverſaries, who fled for ſafety to the Centaur Chiron. Chiron had been the preceptor of Hercules, and therefore they hoped that he would deſiſt in his preſence. Hercules, though awed at the ſight of Chiron, did not deſiſt, but, in the midſt of the engagement, he wounded his preceptor in the knee, who, in the exceſſive pain he ſuffered, exchanged immortality for death. The death of Chiron irritated Hercules the more, and the Centaurs that were preſent, were all extirpated by his hand, and indeed few eſcaped the common deſtruction. Diod. 4.—*Heſiod. in Scut. CENTRONIUS, a man who ſquandered his immenſe riches on uſeleſs and whimſical buildings. Juv. 14, v. 86.

CENTUMVĪRI, the members of a court of juſtice at Rome. They were originally choſen, three from the 35 tribes of the people, and though 105 they were always called Centumvirs. They were afterwards encreaſed to the number of 180, and ſtill kept their original name. The pretor ſent to their tribunal cauſes of the greateſt importance, as their knowledge of the law was extenſive. They were generally ſummoned by the Decemviri, who ſeemed to be the chiefeſt among them; and they aſſembled in the Baſilica, or public court, and had their tribunal diſtinguiſhed by a ſpear with an iron head, whence a decree of their court was called Haſtæ judicium: their ſentences were very impartial, and without appeal. Cic. de orat. 1, c. 38.—Quintil. 4, 5, & 11.—Plin. 6, ep. 33.

CENTŪRIA, a diviſion of the people among the Romans, conſiſting of a hundred. The Roman people were originally divided into three tribes, and each tribe into 10 Curiæ. Servius Tullius made a cenſus; and when he had the place of habitation, name, and profeſſion of every citizen, which amounted to 80,000 men, all able to bear arms; he divided them into ſix claſſes, and each claſs into ſeveral centuries or companies of a hundred men. The firſt claſs conſiſted of 80 centuries, 40 of which were compoſed of men from the age of 45 and upwards, appointed to guard the city. The 40 others were young men from 17 to 45 years of age, appointed to go to war, and fight the enemies of Rome. Their arms were all the ſame, that is, a buckler, a cuiraſs, a helmet, cuiſhes of braſs, with a ſword, a lance, and a javelin; and as they were of the moſt illuſtrious citizens, they were called, by way of eminence, Claſſici, and their inferiors infra claſſem. They were to be worth 1,100,000 aſſes, a ſum equivalent to 1800 pounds Engliſh money. The ſecond, third, and fourth claſſes, conſiſted each of 20 centuries, ten of which were compoſed of the more aged, and the others of the younger ſort of people. Their arms were a large ſhield, a ſpear, and a javelin; they were to be worth in the ſecond claſs, 75,000 aſſes, or about 121l. In the third 50,000, or about 80l.; and in the fourth, 25,000, or about 40l. The fifth claſs conſiſted of 30 centuries, three of which were carpenters by trade, and the others of different profeſſions, ſuch as were neceſſary in a camp. They were all armed with with ſlings and ſtones. They were to be worth 11,000 aſſes, or about 18l. The ſixth claſs contained only one centuria, compriſing the whole body of the pooreſt citizens, who were called Proletarii, as their only ſervice to the ſtate was procreating children. They were alſo called capite cenſi, as the cenſors took notice of their perſon, not of their eſtate. In the public aſſemblies in the Campus Martius, at the election of public magiſtrates, or at the trial of capital crimes, the people gave their vote by centuries, whence the aſſembly was called comitia centuriata. In theſe public aſſemblies, which were never convened only by the conſuls at the permiſſion of the ſenate, or by the dictator, in the abſence of the conſuls, ſome of the people appeared under arms, for fear of an attack from ſome foreign enemy. When a law was propoſed in the public aſſemblies, its neceſſity was explained, and the advantages it would produce to the ſtate were enlarged upon in a harangue; after which, it was expoſed in the moſt conſpicuous parts of the city three market days, that the people might ſee and conſider. Expoſing it to public view, was called proponere legem, and explaining it promulgare legem. He who merely propoſed it, was called lator legis; and he who dwelt upon its importance and utility, and wiſhed it to be enforced, was called auctor legis. When the aſſembly was to be held, the auguries were conſulted by the conſul, who, after haranguing the people, and reminding them to have in view the good of the republic, diſmiſſed them to their reſpective centuries, that their votes might be gathered. They gave their votes vivâ voce, till the year of Rome A. U. C. 615, when they changed the cuſtom, and gave their approbation or diſapprobation by ballots thrown into an urn. If the firſt claſs was unanimous, the others were not conſulted, as the firſt was ſuperior to all the others in number; but if they were not unanimous, they proceeded to conſult the reſt, and the majority decided the queſtion. This advantage of the firſt claſs gave offence to the reſt; and it was afterwards ſettled, that one claſs of the ſix ſhould be drawn by lot, to give its votes firſt, without regard to rank or priority. After all the votes had been gathered, the conſul declared aloud, that the law which had been propoſed was duly and conſtitutionally approved. The ſame ceremonies were obſerved in the election of conſuls, pretors, &c. The word Centuria is alſo applied to a ſubdiviſion of one of the Roman legions; it conſiſted of an hundred men, and was the half of a manipulus, the ſixth part of a cohort, and the ſixtieth part of a legion. The commander of a centuria was called centurio, and he was diſtinguiſhed from the reſt by the branch of a vine which he carried in his hand.

Cephălo, an officer of Eumenes. Diod. 19.

Cephaloedis & Cephalŭdium, a town of Sicily. Sil. 14, v. 253.

Cephălon, a Greek of Ionia, who wrote an hiſtory of Troy, beſides an epitome of univerſal hiſtory from the age of Ninus to Alexander, which he divided into nine books, inſcribed with the name of the nine muſes. He affected not to know the place of his birth, expecting it would be diſputed like Homer's. He lived in the reign of Adrian.

Cephălus, ſon of Deioneus, king of Theſſaly, by Diomede, daughter of Xuthus, married Procris, daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens. Aurora fell in love with him, and carried him away; but he refuſed to liſten toher addreſſes, and was impatient to return to Procris. The goddeſs ſent him back; and to try the fidelity of his wife, ſhe made him put on a different form, and he arrived at the houſe of Procris in the habit of a merchant. Procris was deaf to every offer; but ſhe ſuffered herſelf to be ſeduced by the gold of this ſtranger, who diſcovered himſelf the very moment that Procris had yielded up her virtue. This circumſtance ſo aſhamed Procris, that ſhe fled from her huſband, and devoted herſelf to hunting in the iſland of Eubœa, where ſhe was admitted among the attendants of Diana, who preſented her with a dog always ſure of his prey, and a dart which never miſſed its aim, and always returned to the hands of its miſtreſs of its own accord. Some ſay that the dog was a preſent from Minos, becauſe Procris had cured his wounds. After this, Procris returned in diſguiſe to Cephalus, who was willing to diſgrace himſelf by ſome unnatural conceſſions to obtain the dog and the dart of Procris. Procris diſcovered herſelf at the moment that Cephalus ſhewed himſelf faithleſs, and a reconciliation was eaſily made between them.

They loved one another with more tenderneſs than before, and Cephalus received from his wife the preſents of Diana. As he was particularly fond of hunting, he every morning early repaired to the woods, and after much toil and fatigue, laid himſelf down in the cool ſhade, and earneſtly called for Aura, or the refreſhing breeze. This ambiguous word was miſtaken for a miſtreſs; and ſome informer reported to the jealous Procris, that Cephalus daily paid a viſit to a miſtreſs, whoſe name was Aura. Procris too readily believed the information, and ſecretly followed her huſband into the woods. According to his daily cuſtom, Cephalus retired to the cool, and called after Aura. At the name of Aura, Procris eagerly lifted up her head to ſee her expected rival; her motion occaſioned a ruſtling among the leaves of the buſh that concealed her, Cephalus liſtened, and thinking it to be a wild beaſt, he let fly his unerring dart. Procris was ſtruck to the heart, and inſtantly expired in the arms of her huſband, confeſſing that ill-grounded jealouſy was the cauſe of her death. According to Apollodorus, there were two perſons of the name of Cephalus; one, ſon of Mercury and Herſe, carried away by Aurora, with whom he dwelt in Syria, and by whom he had a ſon called Tithonus. The other married Procris, and was the cauſe of the tragical events mentioned above. *Ovid. CERDYLIUM, a place near Amphipolis. Thucyd. 5, c. 6.

CERĒĂLIA, feſtivals in honor of Ceres; firſt inſtituted at Rome by Memmius the edile, and celebrated on the 19th of April. Perſons in mourning were not permitted to appear at the celebration; therefore they were not obſerved after the battle of Cannæ. They are the ſame as the Theſmophoria of the Greeks. Vid. Theſmophoria.

CERES, the goddeſs of corn and of harveſts, was daughter of Saturn and Veſta. She had a daughter by Jupiter, whom ſhe called Pherephata, fruit bearing, and afterwards Proſerpine. This daughter was carried away by Pluto, as ſhe was gathering flowers in the plains near Enna. The rape of Proſerpine was grevious to Ceres, who ſought her all over Sicily; and when night came, ſhe lighted two torches in the flames of mount Ætna, to continue her ſearch by night all over the world. She at laſt found her veil near the mountain Cyane; but no intelligence could be received of the place of her concealment, till at laſt the nymph Arethuſa informed her that her daughter had been carried away by Pluto. No ſooner had Ceres heard this, than ſhe flies to heaven with her chariot drawn by two dragons, and demands of Jupiter the reſtoration of her daughter. The endeavours of Jupiter to ſoften her by repreſenting Pluto as a powerful god, to become her ſon-in-law, proved fruitleſs, and the reſtoration was granted, provided Proſerpine had not eaten any thing in the kingdom of Pluto. Ceres upon this repairs to Pluto, but Proſerpine had eaten the grains of a pomegranate which ſhe had gathered as ſhe walked over the Elyſian fields, and Aſcalaphus, the only one who had ſeen her, diſcovered it to make his court to Pluto. The return of Proſerpine upon earth, was therefore impracticable; but Aſcalaphus, for his unſolicited information, was changed into an owl. [Vid. Aſcalophus.] The grief of Ceres for the loſs of her daughter was ſo great, that Jupiter granted Proſerpine to paſs ſix months with her mother, and the reſt of the year with Pluto. During the inquiries of Ceres for her daughter, the cultivation of the earth was neglected, and the ground became became barren; therefore, to repair the loss which mankind had suffered by her absence, the goddess went to Attica, which was become the most desolate country in the world, and instructed Triptolemus of Eleusis in every thing which concerned agriculture. She taught him how to plough the ground, to sow and reap the corn, to make bread, and to take particular care of fruit trees. After these instructions, she gave him her chariot, and commanded him to travel all over the world, and communicate his knowledge of agriculture to the rude inhabitants, who hitherto lived upon acorns and the roots of the earth. [Vid. Triptolemus.] Her beneficence to mankind made Ceres respected. Sicily was supposed to be the favorite retreat of the goddess, and Diodorus says, that she and her daughter made their first appearance to mankind in Sicily, which Pluto received as a nuptial dowry from Jupiter when he married Proserpine. The Sicilians made a yearly sacrifice to Ceres, every man according to his abilities; and the fountain of Cyane, through which Pluto opened himself a passage with his trident, when carrying away Proserpine, was publicly honored with an offering of bulls, and the blood of the victims was shed in the waters of the fountain. Besides these, other ceremonies were observed in honor of the goddesses who had so peculiarly favored the island. The commemoration of the rape was celebrated about the beginning of the harvest, and the search of Ceres at the time that corn is sown in the earth. The latter festival continued six successive days; and during the celebration, the votaries of Ceres made use of some free and wanton expressions, as that language had made the goddess smile while melancholy for the loss of her daughter. Attica, which had been so eminently distinguished by the goddess, gratefully remembered her favors in the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries. [Vid. Eleusinia.] Ceres also performed the duties of a legislator, and the Sicilians found the advantages of her salutary laws; hence, her surname of Thesmophora. She is the same as the Isis of the Egyptians, and her worship, it is said, was first brought into Greece by Erechtheus. She met with different adventures when she travelled over the earth, and the impudence of Stellio was severely punished. To avoid the importunities of Neptune, she changed herself into a mare; but the god took the advantage of her metamorphosis, and from their union arose the horse Arion. [Vid. Arion.] The birth of this monster so offended Ceres, that she withdrew herself from the sight of mankind; and the earth would have perished for want of her assistance, had not Pan discovered her in Arcadia, and given information of it to Jupiter. The Parcæ were sent by the god to comfort her, and at their persuasion she returned to Sicily, where her statues represented her veiled in black, with the head of a horse, and holding a dove in one hand, and in the other a dolphin. In their sacrifices, the ancients offered Ceres a pregnant sow, as that animal often injures and destroys the productions of the earth. While the corn was yet in grass, they offered her a ram, after the victim had been led three times round the field. Ceres was represented with a garland of ears of corn on her head, holding in one hand a lighted torch, and in the other a poppy, which was sacred to her. She appears as a countrywoman mounted on the back of an ox, and carrying a basket on her left arm, and holding a hoe; and sometimes she rides in a chariot drawn by winged dragons. She was supposed to be the same as Rhea, Tellus, Cybele, Bona Dea, Berecynthia, &c. The Romans paid her great adoration, and her festivals were yearly celebrated by the Roman matrons on the month of April, during eight days. These matrons abstained during several days from the use of wine, or any carnal enjoyments. They always bore lighted torches in commemoration of the goddess; and whoever came to these festivals without a previous initiation, were punished with death. Ceres is metaphorically called bread and corn, as the word Bacchus is sometimes used to signify wine. Apollod. 1, c. 5, l. 2, c. 1. l. 3, c. 12 & 14.—Paus. 1, c. 31. l. 2, c. 34. l. 3, c. 23. l. 8, c. 25 &c.—Diod. 1, &c.—*Hesiod. CHARĪLA, a feſtival obſerved once in nine years by the Delphians. It owes its origin to this circumſtance: In a great famine the people of Delphi aſſembled and applied to their king to relieve their wants. He accordingly diſtributed the little corn he had among the nobleſt; but as a poor little girl, called Charila, begged the king with more than common earneſtneſs, he beat her with his ſhoe, and the girl, unable to bear his treatment, hanged herſelf in her girdle. The famine increaſed; and the oracle told the king, that to relieve his people, he muſt atone for the murder of Charila. Upon this a feſtival was inſtituted, with expiatory rites. The king preſided over this inſtitution, and diſtributed pulſe and corn to ſuch as attended. Charila's image was brought before the king, who ſtruck it with his ſhoe; after which it was carried to a deſolate place, where they put a halter round its neck, and buried it where Charila was buried. Plut. in Quæſt. Græc.

CHARILĀUS & CHARILLUS, a ſon of Polydectes king of Sparta, educated and protected by his uncle Lycurgus. He made war againſt Argos, and attacked Tegea. CHARĪTES & GRATIÆ, the Graces, daughters of Venus by Jupiter or Bacchus, are three in number, Aglaia, Thalia, and Euphroſyne. They were the conſtant attendants of Venus, and they were repreſented as three young, beautiful, and modeſt virgins, all holding one another by the hand. They preſided over kindneſs and all good offices, and their worſhip was the ſame as that of the nine Muſes, with whom they had a temple in common. They were generally repreſented naked, becauſe kindneſſes ought to be done with ſincerity and candor. The moderns explain the allegory of their holding their hands joined, by obſerving, that there ought to be a perpetual and never ceaſing intercourſe of kindneſs and benevolence among friends. Their youth denotes the conſtant remembrance that we ought ever to have of kindneſſes received; and their virgin purity and innocence teaches us, that acts of benevolence ought to be done without any expectations of reſtoration, and that we ought never to ſuffer others or ourſelves to be guilty of baſe or impure favors.

CHARITON, a writer of Aphrodiſium, at the latter end of the 4th century. He compoſed a Greek romance, called The Loves of Chæreas and Callirhoe, which has been much admired for its elegance, and the originality of the characters it deſcribes. There is a very learned edition of Chariton, by Reiſke, with D'Orville's notes, 2 vols. 4to. Amſt. 1750.

CHARMĂDAS, a philoſopher of uncommon memory. Plin. 7, c. 24.

CHARME & CARME, the mother of Britomartis by Jupiter.

CHARMIDES, a Lacedæmonian, ſent by his king to quell ſeditions in Crete. Pauſ. 3, c. 2.——A boxer, Id. 6, c. 7.——A philoſopher of the third academy, B. C. 95.

CHARMINUS, an Athenian general, who defeated the Peloponneſians. Thucyd. 8, c. 42.

CHARMIONE, a ſervant maid of Cleopatra, who ſtabbed herſelf after the example of her miſtreſs. Plut. in Cæſar.

CHARON, a Theban, who received into his houſe Pelopidas and his friends, when they delivered Thebes from tyranny, &c. Plut. in Pelop.——An hiſtorian of Lampſacus, who wrote two books on Perſia, beſides other treatiſes, B. C. 479.——An hiſtorian of Naucratis, who wrote an hiſtory of his country, and of Egypt.——A Carthaginian writer, &c.——A god of hell, ſon of Erebus and Nox, who conducted the ſouls of the dead in a boat over the river Styx and Acheron, to the infernal regions, for an obolus. Such as had not been honored with a funeral were not permitted to enter his boat, without previouſly wandering on the ſhore for one hundred years. If any living perſon preſented himſelf to croſs the Stygian lake, he could not be admitted before he ſhowed Charon a golden bough, which he received from the Sybil; and Charon was impriſoned for one year, becauſe he had ferried over, againſt his own will, Hercules, without this paſſport. Charon is repreſented as an old robuſt man, with a hideous countenance, long white beard, and piercing eyes. His garment is ragged and filthy, and his forehead is covered with wrinkles. As all the dead were obliged to pay a ſmall piece of money for their admiſſion, it was always uſual, among the ancients, to place under the tongue of the deceaſed, a piece of money for Charon. This fable of Charon and his boat is borrowed from the Egyptians, whoſe dead were carried across a lake, where ſentence was paſſed over them, and according to their good or bad actions, they were honored with a ſplendid burial, or left unnoticed in the open air. Vid. Acheruſia. Diod. 1.—Senec. in Herc. Fur. act. 3, v. 765. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 298, &c.

CHARONDAS, a man of Catana, who gave laws to the people of Thurium, and made a law that no man ſhould be permitted to come armed into the aſſembly. He inadvertently broke this law, and when told of it, he fell upon his ſword, B. C. 446. Val. Max. 6, c. 5.

CHARONEA, a place of Aſia, &c.

CHARONIUM, a cave near Nyſa, where the ſick were ſuppoſed to be delivered from their diſorders by certain ſuperſtitious ſolemnities.

CHAROPS & CHARŎPES, a Trojan, killed by Ulyſſes. Homer. Il.——A powerful Epirot who aſſiſted Flaminius when making war againſt Philip the king of Macedonia. Plut. in Flam.——The firſt decennial archon at Athens. Paterc. 1, c. 8.

CHARYBDIS, a dangerous whirlpool on the coaſt of Sicily, oppoſite another whirlpool called Scylla, on the coaſt of Italy. It was very dangerous to ſailors, and it proved fatal to part of the fleet of Ulyſſes. The words Incidit in Scyllam qui vult vitare Charybdin, became a proverb, to ſhew that in our eagerneſs to avoid an evil, we fall into a greater. The name of Charybdis was properly beſtowed on miſtreſſes who repay affection and tenderneſs with ingratitude. It is ſuppoſed that Charybdis was an avaricious woman, who ſtole the oxen of Hercules, for which theft ſhe was ſtruck with thunder by Jupiter, and changed into a whirlpool. Lycophr. in Caſſ.—Homer. Od. 12.—Propert. 3, el. 11.—Ibid. 14.—Ovid. in Ibin. de Ponto, 4, el. 10. Amor. 2, el. 16.—Virg. Æn. v. 420.

CHILO, a Spartan philosopher, who has been called one of the seven wise men of Greece. He died through excess of joy, in the arms of his son, who had obtained a victory at Olympia, B. C. 597. Plin. 7, c. 33.—Laert.——One of the Ephori at Sparta, B. C. 556.

CHILONIS, the wife of Theopompus king of Sparta. Polyæn. 8.

CHIMÆRA, a celebrated monster, sprung from Echidna and Typhon, which had three heads, that of a lion, a goat, and a dragon, and continually vomited flames. The foreparts of its body were those of a lion, the middle was that of a goat, and the hinder parts were those of a dragon. It generally lived in Lycia, about the reign of Jobates, by whose orders Bellerophon, mounted on the horse Pegasus, overcame it. This fabulous tradition is explained by the recollection that there was a burning mountain in Lycia, whose top was the resort of lions, on account of its desolate wilderness; the middle, which was fruitful, was covered with goats; and at the bottom the marshy ground abounded with serpents. Bellerophon is said to have conquered the Chimæra, because he first made his habitation on that mountain. Plutarch says, that it is the captain of some pirates, who adorned their ship with the images of a lion, a goat, and a dragon. Hesiod. Theog. v. 322.—Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 2, c. 3.—Lucret. 5, v. 903.—Ovid. Met. v. 646.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 288.—— One of the ships in the fleet of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 118.

CHIMERIUM, a mountain of Phthiotis, in Thessaly. Plin. 4, c. 8.

CHIOMARA, a woman who cut off the head of a Roman tribune when she had been taken prisoner, &c. Plut. de Virt. Mul.

Chion, a Greek writer, whose epiſtles were edited cum notis, Cobergi, 8vo. Lipſ. 1765.

Chione, a daughter of Dædalion, of whom Apollo and Mercury became enamoured. To enjoy her company, Mercury lulled her to ſleep with his Caduceus, and Apollo, in the night, under the form of an old woman, obtained the ſame favors as Mercury. From this embrace Chione became mother of Philammon and Autolycus, the former of whom, as being ſon of Apollo, became an excellent muſician; and the latter was equally notorious for his robberies, of which his father Mercury was the patron. Chione grew ſo proud of her commerce with the gods, that ſhe even preferred her beauty to that of Juno, for which impiety ſhe was killed by the goddeſs, and changed into a hawk. Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 8.——A daughter of Boreas and Orithyia, who had Eumolpus by Neptune. She threw her ſon into the ſea, but he was preſerved by his father. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Pauſ. 1, c. 38.——A famous proſtitute. Martial. 3. ep. 34.

Chios, an iſland in the Ægean ſea, between Leſbos and Samos, on the coaſt of Aſia Minor, which receives its name, as ſome ſuppoſe, from Chione, or from χιων, ſnow, which was very frequent there. It was well inhabited, and could once equip a hundred ſhips; and its chief town, called Chios, had a beautiful harbor, which could contain 80 ſhips. The wine of this iſland, ſo much celebrated by the ancients, is ſtill in general eſteem. Chios was anciently called Æthalia, Macris, and Pityaſa. There was no adultery committed there for the ſpace of 700 years. Plut. de Virt. Mul.—Horat. 1, ſat. 10, v. 24.—Pauſ. 7, c. 4.—Mela. 2, v. 2.—Strab. 2.

Chiron, a centaur, half a man and half a horſe, ſon of Philyra and Saturn, who had changed himſelf into a horſe, to eſcape the enquiries of his wife Rhea. Chiron was famous for his knowledge of muſic, medicine and ſhooting. He taught mankind the uſe of plants and medicinal herbs; and he inſtructed, in all the polite arts, the greateſt heroes of his age; ſuch as Achilles, Æſculapius, Hercules, &c. He was wounded in the knee by a poiſoned arrow, by Hercules, in his purſuit of the centaurs. Hercules flew to his aſſiſtance; but as the wound was incurable, and the cauſe of the moſt excruciating pains, Chiron begged Jupiter to deprive him of immortality. His prayers were heard, and he was placed by the god among the conſtellations, under the name of Sagittarius. Heſiod. in Scuto.—Homer. Il. 11.—Pauſ. 3, c. 18. l. 5, c. 19. l. 9, c. 31.—*Ovid. Chœrilus, a tragic poet of Athens, who wrote 150 tragedies, of which 13 obtained the prize.——An hiſtorian of Samos.——Two other poets, one of whom was very intimate with Herodotus. He wrote a poem on the victory which the Athenians had obtained over Xerxes, and on account of the excellence of the compoſition, he received a piece of gold for each verſe from the Athenians, and was publicly ranked with Homer as a poet. The other was one of Alexander's flatterers and friends. It is ſaid the prince promiſed him as many pieces of gold as there ſhould be good verſes in his poetry, and as many many ſlaps on the forehead as there were bad; and in conſequence of this, ſcarce ſix of his verſes in each poem were entitled to gold, while the reſt were rewarded with the caſtigation. Plut. in Alex.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 232.

CHŒREÆ, a place of Bœotia.

Cibaritis, a country of Aſia, near the Mæander.

Cibyra, a town of Phrygia——of Caria.

M. T. Cicĕro, born at Arpinum, was ſon of a Roman knight, and lineally deſcended from the ancient kings of the Sabines. His mother's name was Helvia. After diſplaying many promiſing abilities at ſchool, he was taught philoſophy by Philo, and law by Mutius Scævola. He acquired and perfected a taſte for military knowledge under Sylla, in the Marſian war, and retired from Rome, which was divided into factions, to indulge his philoſophic propenſities. He was naturally of a weak and delicate conſtitution, and he viſited Greece on account of his health; but, perhaps, the true cauſe of his abſence from Rome might be attributed to his fear of Sylla. His friends, who were well acquainted with his ſuperior abilities, were anxious for his return; and when at laſt he obeyed their ſolicitations, he applied himſelf with uncommon diligence to oratory, and was ſoon diſtinguiſhed above all the ſpeakers of his age in the Roman forum. When he went to Sicily as quæſtor, he behaved with great juſtice and moderation; and the Sicilians remembered with gratitude the eloquence of Cicero, their common patron, who had delivered them from the tyranny and avarice of Verres. After he had paſſed through the offices of edile and prætor, he ſtood a candidate for the conſulſhip, A. U. C. 689; and the patricians and the plebeians were equally anxious to raiſe him to that dignity, againſt the efforts and bribery of Catiline. His new ſituation was critical, and required circumſpection. Catiline, with many diſſolute and deſperate Romans, had conſpired againſt their country, and combined to murder Cicero himſelf, himſelf. In this dilemma, Cicero, in full ſenate, accuſed Catiline of treaſon againſt the ſtate; but as his evidence was not clear, his efforts were unavailing. He, however, ſtood upon his guard, and by the information of his friends, and the diſcovery of Fulvia, his life was ſaved from the dagger of Marcius and Cethegus, whom Catiline had ſent to aſſaſſinate him. After this, Cicero commanded Catiline, in the ſenate, to leave the city; and this deſperate conſpirator marched out in triumph to meet the 20,000 men who were aſſembled to ſupport his cauſe. The lieutenant of C. Antony, the other conſul, defeated them in Gaul; and Cicero, at Rome, puniſhed the reſt of the conſpirators with death. This capital puniſhment, though inveighed againſt by J. Cæſar as too ſevere, was ſupported by the opinion of Lutatius Catulus, and Cato, and confirmed by the whole ſenate. After this memorable deliverance, Cicero received the thanks of all the people, and was ſtiled The father of his country, and a ſecond founder of Rome. The vehemence with which he had attacked Clodius, proved injurious to him; and when his enemy was made tribune, Cicero was baniſhed from Rome, though 20,000 young men were ſupporters of his innocence. He was not, however, deſerted in his baniſhment. Wherever he went, he was received with uncommon favor; and when the faction had ſubſided at Rome, all the ſenate and people were unanimous for his return. After ſixteen months abſence, he entered Rome with univerſal ſatisfaction; and when he was ſent, with the power of proconſul, to Cilicia, his integrity and prudence made him ſucceſsful againſt the enemy, and, at his return, he was honored with a triumph which the factions prevented him to have. After much heſitation, during the civil commotions between Cæſar and Pompey, he joined himſelf to the latter, and followed him to Greece. When victory had declared in favor of Cæſar, at the battle of Pharſalia, Cicero went to Brundiſium, and was reconciled to the conqueror, who treated him with great humanity. From this time Cicero retired into the country, and ſeldom viſited Rome. When Cæſar had been ſtabbed in the ſenate, Cicero recommended a general amneſty, and was the moſt earneſt to decree the provinces to Brutus and Caſſius. But when he ſaw the intereſt of Cæſar's murderers decreaſed, and Antony come into power, he retired to Athens. He ſoon after returned, but lived in perpetual fear of aſſaſſination. Auguſtus courted the approbation of Cicero, and expreſſed his wiſh to be his colleague in the conſulſhip. But his wiſh was not ſincere; he ſoon rejected him; and when the two conſuls had been killed at Mutina, Auguſtus joined his intereſt to that of Antony, and the triumvirate was ſoon after formed. The great enmity which Cicero bore to Antony, was fatal to him; and Auguſtus, Antony, and Lepidus, the triumvirs, to deſtroy all cauſe of quarrel, and each to diſpatch his enemies, produced their liſt of proſcription. About two hundred were doomed to death, and Cicero was among them, upon the liſt of Antony. Auguſtus yielded a man to whom he partly owed his greatneſs, and Cicero was purſued by the emiſſaries of Antony, among whom was Popilius, whom he had defended upon an accuſation of parricide. He had fled in a litter towards the ſea of Caieta; and when the aſſaſſins came up to him, he put his head out of the litter, and it was ſevered from the body by Herennius. This memorable event happened in December, 43 B. C. after the enjoyment of life for 63 years, 11 months, and five days. The head and right hand were carried to Rome, and hung up in the Roman forum; and ſo inveterate was Antony's hatred againſt the unfortunate man, that even Fulvia, the triumvir's wife, wreaked her vengeance upon his head, and drew the tongue out of his mouth, and bored it through repeatedly with a gold bodkin, verifying, in this act of inhumanity, what Cicero had once obſerved, that no animal is more revengeful than a woman. Cicero has acquired more real fame by his literary compoſitions, than by his ſpirited exertions as a Roman ſenator. The learning and the abilities which he poſſeſſed, have been the admiration of every age and country, and his ſtyle has always been accounted as the true ſtandard of pure latinity. The words naſcitur poeta have been verified in his attempts to write poetry; and the ſatyr of Martial, Carmina quod ſcribit muſis et Apolline nullo, though ſevere, is true. He once formed a deſign to write the hiſtory of his country, but he was diſappointed. He tranſlated many of the Greek writers, poets as well as hiſtorians, for his own improvement. When he travelled into Aſia, he was attended by moſt of the learned men of his age; and his ſtay at Rhodes, in the ſchool of the famous Molo, conduced not a little to perfect his judgment. Like his countrymen, he was not deſtitute of ambition, and the arrogant expectations with which he returned from his quæſtorſhip in Sicily are well known. He was of a timid diſpoſition; and he who ſhone as the father of Roman eloquence, never aſcended the pulpit to harangue without feeling a ſecret emotion of dread. His conduct, during the civil wars, is far from that of a patriot; and when we view him, dubious and irreſolute, ſorry not to follow Pompey, and yet afraid to oppoſe Cæſar, the judgment would almoſt give him the name of coward.

In his private character, however, Cicero was of an amiable diſpoſition; and though he was too elated with proſperity, and debaſed by adverſity, the affability of the friend conciliated the good graces of all. He married Terentia, whom he afterwards divorced, and by whom he had a ſon and daughter. He afterwards married a young woman, to whom he was guardian; and becauſe ſhe ſeemed elated at the death of his daughter Tullia, he repudiated her. The works of this celebrated man, of which, according to ſome, the tenth part is ſcarce extant, have been edited by the beſt ſcholars in every country. The moſt valuable editions of the works compleat, are that of Verburgius, 2 vols. fol. Amſt. 1724.—that of Olivet, 9 vols. 4to. Geneva, 1758.—the Oxford edition in 10 vols. 4to, 1782.—and that of Lallemand, 12mo. 14 vols. Paris apud Barbou, 1768. Plutarch. in vitâ.—Quintil.—Dio. Caſſ.—Appian.—Florus.—C. Nep. in Attic.—Eutrop.—Cic. &c.——Marcus, the ſon of Cicero, was taken by Auguſtus as his colleague in the conſulſhip. He revenged his father's death, by throwing public diſhonor on the memory of Antony. He diſgraced his father's virtues, and was ſo fond of drinking, that Pliny obſerves, he wiſhed to deprive Antony of the honor of being the greateſt drunkard in the Roman empire. Plut. in Cic.——Quintus, the brother of the orator, was Cæſar's lieutenant in Gaul, and proconſul of Aſia, for three years. He was proſcribed with his ſon at the ſame time as his brother Tully. Plut. in Cic.—Appian.

Cichyris, a town of Epirus.

Cicŏnes, a people of Thrace near the Hebrus. Ulyſſes, at his return from Troy, conquered them, and plundered their chief city Iſmarus. They tore to pieces, Orpheus, for his obſcene indulgences. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 83. l. 15, v. 313.—Virg. G. 4, v. 520, &c.—Mela. 2, c. 2.

Cimberius, a chief of the Suevi.

Cimbri, a people of Germany, who invaded the Roman empire with a large army, and were conquered by Marius. Flor. 3, c. 3.

Cimbricum bellum, was begun by the Cimbri and Teutones, by an invaſion of the Roman territories, B. C. 109. Theſe barbarians were ſo courageous, and even deſperate, that they faſtened their firſt ranks, each to the other, with cords. In the firſt battle they deſtroyed 80,000 Romans, under the conſuls Manlius and Servilius Cæpio. But Marius, in his ſecond conſulſhip, was choſen to carry on the war againſt them; he met the Teutones at Aquæ Sextiæ, where, after a bloody engagement, he left dead on the field of battle 20 000, and took 90,000 priſoners, B. C. 102. The Cimbri, who had formed another army, had already penetrated into Italy, where they were met at the river Atheſis, by Marius and his colleague Catulus, a year after. An engagement enſued, and 140,060 of them were ſlain. This laſt battle put an end to this dreadful war, and the two conſuls entered Rome in triumph. Flor. 3, c. 3.—Plin. 7, c. 22, l. 17, c. 1.—Mela. 3, c. 3.—Paterc. 2, c. 12.—Plut. in Mario.

Cimōlis & Cinolis, a town of Paphlagonia.

Cimōlus, an island in the Cretan sea. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 463.

Cimon, an Athenian, son of Miltiades and Hegisipyle, famous for his debaucheries in his youth, and the reformation of his morals when arrived to years of discretion. When his father died, he was imprisoned, because unable to pay the fine laid upon him by the Athenians; but he was released from confinement by his sister and wife Elpinice. (Vid. Elpinice.) He behaved with great courage at the battle of Salamis, and rendered himself popular by his munificence and valor. He defeated the Persian fleet, and took 200 ships, and totally routed their land army, the very same day. The money that he obtained by his victories, was not applied to his own private use; but with it he fortified and embellished the city. He some time after lost all his popularity, and was banished by the Athenians, who declared war against the Lacedæmonians. He was recalled from his exile, and at his return, he made a reconciliation between Lacedæmon and his countrymen. He was afterwards appointed to carry on the war against Persia in Egypt, and Cyprus, with a fleet of 200 ships; and on the coast of Asia, he gave battle to the enemy, and totally ruined their fleet. He died as he was besieging the town of Citium in Cyprus, B. C. 449, in the 51st year of his age. He may be called the last of the Greeks, whose spirit and boldness defeated the armies of the barbarians. He was such an inveterate enemy to the Persian power, that he formed a plan of totally destroying it; and in his wars, he had so reduced the Persians, that they promised in a treaty, not to pass the Chelidonian islands with their fleet, or to approach within a day's journey of the Grecian seas. The munificence of Cimon has been highly extolled by his biographers, and he has been praised for leaving his gardens open to the public. Thucyd. 1, c. 100 and 112.—Justin. 2. c. 15.—Diod. 11.—Plut. & C. Nep. in vitâ——An Athenian, father of Miltiades. Herodot. 6, c. 34.——A Roman, supported in prison by the milk of his daughter.——An Athenian, who wrote an account of the war of the Amazons against his country.

L. Q. Cincinnātus, a celebrated Roman, who was informed, as he ploughed his field, that the senate had chosen him dictator. Upon this he left his ploughed land with regret, and repaired to the field of battle, where his countrymen were closely besieged by the Volsci and Æqui. He conquered the enemy, and returned to Rome in triumph; and 16 days after his appointment, he laid down his office, and retired back to plough his fields. In his 80th year, he was again summoned against Prænestæ as dictator; and after a successful campaign, he resigned the absolute power he had enjoyed only 21 days, disregarding the rewards that were offered him by the senate. He flourished about 460 years before Christ. Liv. 3, c. 26.—Flor. 1, c. 11.—Cic. de Finib. 4.

CIPPUS, a noble Roman, who, as he returned home victorious, was told that if he entered the city he muſt reign there. Unwilling to enſlave his country, he aſſembled the ſenate without the walls, and baniſhed himſelf for ever from the city, and retired to live upon a ſingle acre of ground. Ovid. Met. 15. v. 565.

CIRCE, a daughter of Sol and Perſeis, celebrated for her knowledge of magic and venomous herbs. She was ſiſter to Æetes king of Colchis, and Paſiphae the wife of Minos. She married a Sarmatian prince of Colchis, whom ſhe murdered to obtain the kingdom. She was expelled by her ſubjects, and carried by her father upon the coaſts of Italy, in an iſland called Æa. Ulyſſes, at his return from the Trojan war, viſited her coaſts; and all his companions, who ran headlong into pleaſure and voluptuouſneſs, were changed by Circe's potions into filthy ſwine. Ulyſſes, who was fortified againſt all enchantments by an herb called moly, which he had received from Mercury, went to Circe, and demanded, ſword in hand, the reſtoration of his companions to their former ſtate. She complied, and loaded the hero with pleaſures and honors. In this voluptuous retreat, Ulyſſes had by Circe one ſon called Telegonus, or two according to Heſiod, called Agrius & Latinus. For one whole year, Ulyſſes forgot his glory in Circe's arms. At his departure, the nymph adviſed him to deſcend to hell, and conſult the manes of Tireſias, concerning the fates that attended him. Circe ſhowed herſelf cruel to Scylla her rival, and to Picus. [Vid. Scylla & Picus.]

CIRCENSES LUDI, games performed in the circus at Rome. They were dedicated to the god Conſus, and were firſt eſtabliſhed by Romulus at the rape of the Sabines. They were in imitation of the Olympian games among the Greeks, and, by way of eminence, were often called the great games. Their original name was Conſualia, and they were firſt called Circenſians by Tarquin the elder after he had built the Circus. They were not appropriated to one particular exhibition; but were equally celebrated for leaping, wreſtling, throwing the quoit and javelin, races on foot as well as in chariots, and boxing. Like the Greeks, they gave the name of Pentathlum or Quinquertium to theſe five exerciſes. The celebration continued five days, beginning on the 15th of September. All games in general that were exhibited in the Circus, were ſoon after called Circenſian games. Some ſea-fights and ſkirmiſhes, called by the Romans Naumachiæ, were afterwards exhibited in the Circus. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 636.

Claudiānus, a celebrated poet in the age of Honorius and Arcadius, who ſeems to poſſeſs all the majeſty of Virgil, without being a ſlave to the corrupted ſtyle which prevailed in his age. Scaliger obſerves, that he has ſupplied the poverty of his matter, by the purity of his language, the happineſs of his expreſſions, and the melody of his numbers. As he was the favorite of Stilicho, he retired when his patron was diſgraced, and paſſed the reſt of his life in retirement, and learned eaſe. His poems on Rufinus and Eutropius, ſeem to be the beſt of his compoſitions. The beſt editions of his works are that of Burman, 4to. 2 vols, Amſt. 1760, and that of Geſner, 2 vols, 8vo. Lipſ. 1758.

Claudiopŏlis, a town of Cappadocia. Plin. 5, c. 24.

Claudius 1. (Tiber. Druſus Nero) ſon of Druſus, Livia's ſecond ſon, ſucceeded as emperor of Rome, after the murder of Caligula, whoſe memory he endeavoured to annihilate. He made himſelf popular for a while, by taking particular care of the city, and by adorning and beautifying it with buildings. He paſſed over into Britain, and obtained a triumph for victories which his generals had obtained, and ſuffered himſelf to be governed by favorites, whoſe licentiouſneſs and avarice plundered the ſtate, and diſtracted the provinces. He married four wives, one of whom, called Meſſalina, he put to death on account of her luſt and debauchery. He was at laſt poiſoned by another called Agrippina, who wiſhed to raiſe her ſon Nero to the throne. The poiſon was conveyed in muſhrooms; but as it did not operate faſt enough, his phyſician, by order of the empreſs, made him ſwallow a poiſoned feather. He died in the 63d year of his age, 13 October, A. D. 54, after a reign of 13 years; diſtinguiſhed neither by humanity nor courage, but debaſed by weakneſs and irreſolution. He was ſucceeded by Nero. Tacit. Ann. 11, &c.—Dio. 60.—Juv. 6, v. 619.—Suet. in vitâ——The ſecond emperor of that name, was a Dalmatian, who ſucceeded Gallienus. He conquered the Goths, Scythians, and Heruli, and killed no leſs than 300,000 in a battle; and after a reign of about two years, died of the plague in Pannonia. The excellence of his character, marked with bravery, and tempered with juſtice and benevolence, is well known by theſe words of the ſenate, addreſſed to him: Claudi Auguſte, tu frater, tu pater, tu amicus, tu bonus ſenator, tu vere princeps.——Nero, a conſul, with Liv. Salinator, who defeated and killed Aſdrubal, near the river Metaurum, as he was paſſing from Spain into Italy, to go to the aſſiſtance of his brother Annibal. Liv. 27, &c.—Horat. 4, od. 4, v. 37.—Sueton. in Tib.——The father of the emperor Tiberius, quæſtor to Cæſar in the wars of Alexandria.——Pollo, an hiſtorian. Plin. 7, ep. 51.——Pontius, a general of the Samnites, who conquered the Romans at Furcæ Caudinæ, and made them paſs under the yoke. Liv. 9, c. 1, &c.——Petilius, a dictator A. U. C. 442.——Appius, an orator. Cic. in Brut. Vid. Appius.——App. Cæcus, a Roman cenſor, who built an aqueduct A. U. C. 441, which brought water to Rome from Tuſculum, at the diſtance of ſeven or eight miles. The water was called Appia, and it was the firſt that was brought to the city from the country. Before his age, the Romans were ſatisfied with the waters of the Tiber, or of the fountains and wells in the city. [Vid. Appius.]——A prætor of Sicily.——Publius, a great enemy to Cicero. Vid. Clodius.——Marcellus. Vid. Marcellus.——Pulcher, a conſul, who, when conſulting the ſacred chickens, ordered them to be dipped in water, becauſe they would not eat. Liv. ep. 19. He was unſucceſsful in his expedition againſt the Carthaginians in Sicily, and diſgraced on his return to Rome.——Tiberius Nero, was elder brother of Druſus, and ſon of Livia Druſilla, who married Auguſtus, after his divorce of Scribonia. He married Livia, the emperor's daughter by Scribonia, and ſucceeded in the empire by the name of Tiberius. Vid. Tiberius. Horat. 1, ep. 3, v. 2.——The name of Claudius is common to many Roman conſuls, and other officers of ſtate; but nothing is recorded of them, and their name is but barely mentioned. Liv.

CLAUSUS or CLAUDIUS, a king of the Sabines, who aſſiſted Turnus againſt Æneas. He was the progenitor of that Ap. Claudius, who migrated to Rome, and became the founder of the Claudian family. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 707. l. 10, v. 345.

CLAZOMENÆ & CLAZOMENA, a city of Ionia, on the coaſts of the Ægean ſea, between Smyrna and Chios. It was founded A. U. C. 98, by the Ionians, and gave birth to Anaxagoras and other illuſtrious men. Mela. 1, c. 17.—Plin. 5, c. 29.—Strab. 14.

CLEADAS, a man of Platæa, who raiſed tombs over thoſe who had been killed in the battle againſt Mardonius. Herodot. 9, c. 85.

CLEANDER, one of Alexander's officers, who killed Parmenio by the king's command. He was puniſhed with death, for offering violence to a noble virgin, and giving her as a proſtitute to his ſervants. Curt. 7, c. 2. l. 10, c. 1.——The firſt tyrant of Gela. Ariſtot. 5, Polit. c. 12.——A ſoothſayer of Arcadia. Herodot. 6, c. 83.——A favourite of the emperor Commodus, who was put to death, A. D. 190, after abuſing public Juſtice, and his maſter's confidence.

CLEANDRIDAS, a Spartan general, &c.——A man puniſhed with death, for bribing two of the Ephori.

CLEANTHES, a ſtoic philoſopher, ſucceſſor of Zeno. He was ſo poor, that to maintain himſelf, he uſed to draw out water for a gardener in the night, and ſtudy in the day time. Cicero calls him the father of the ſtoics; and in reſpect to his virtues, the Roman ſenate raiſed a ſtatue to him in Aſſos. It is ſaid that he ſtarved himſelf in his 90th year, B. C. 240. Strab. 13.—Cic. de finib. 2, c. 69. l. 4, c. 7.

CLEARCHUS, a tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, who was killed by Chion and Leonidas, Plato's pupils, during the celebration of the feſtivals of Bacchus, after the enjoyment of the ſovereign power during twelve years, 353 B. C. Juſtin. 16, c. 4.—Diod. 15.——The ſecond tyrant of Heraclea of that name, died B. C. 288.——A Lacedæmonian ſent to quiet the Byzantines. He was recalled, but refuſed to obey, and fled to Cyrus the younger, who made him captain of 13,000 Greek ſoldiers. He obtained a victory over Artaxerxes, who was ſo enraged at the defeat, that when Clearchus fell into his hands, by the treachery of Tiſſaphernes, he put him immediately to death. Diod. 14.——A diſciple of Ariſtotle, who wrote a treatiſe on tactics, &c. Xenoph.

CLEARIDES, a ſon of Cleonymus governor of Amphipolis. Thucyd. 4, c. 132. l. 5, c. 10.

CLEMENS ROMANUS, one of the fathers of the church, ſaid to be contemporary with St. Paul. Several ſpurious compoſitions are aſcribed to him, but the only thing extant is his epiſtle to the Corinthians, to quiet the diſturbances that had ariſen there. It has been much admired. The beſt edition is that of Wotton, 8vo. Cantab. 1718.——Another of Alexandria, called from thence Alexandrinus, who floriſhed 206 A. D. His works are various, elegant, and full of erudition; the beſt edition of which is Potter's, 2 vols. folio, Oxon. 1715.——A ſenator who favored the party of Niger againſt Severus.

CLEO, a Sicilian among Alexander's flatterers. Curt. 8, c. 5.

CLEŎBIS & EITON, two youths, ſons of Cydippe, the prieſteſs of Juno at Argos. When oxen could not be procured to draw their mother's chariot to the temple of Juno, they put themſelves under the yoke, and drew it 45 ſtadia to the temple, amidſt the acclamations of the multitude, who congratulated the mother on account of the piety of her ſons. Cydippe entreated the goddeſs to reward the piety of her ſons with the beſt gift that could be granted to a mortal. They went to reſt, and awoke no more; and by this the goddeſs ſhewed, that death is the only true happy event that can happen to a man. The Argives raiſed them ſtatues at Delphi Cic. Tuſc. 1, c. 47.—Val. Max. 5, c. 4.—Herodot. 1, c. 31.—Plut. de conſ. ad. Apol.

CLEOBŪLA, the wife of Amyntor, by whom ſhe had Phœnix.——A daughter of Boreas and Orithyia, called alſo Cleopatra. She married Phineus ſon of Agenor, by whom ſhe had Plexippus and Pandion. CLEOMANTES, a Lacedæmonian ſoothſayer. Plut. in Alex.

CLEOMBRŎTUS, ſon of Pauſanias, king of Sparta, after his brother Ageſipolis 1ſt. He made war againſt the Bœotians, and leſt he ſhould be ſuſpected of treacherous communications with Epaminondas, he gave that general battle at Leuctra, in a very diſadvantageous place. He was killed in the engagement, and his army deſtroyed, B. C. 371. Diod. 15.—Pauſ. 9, c. 13.—Xenoph.——A ſon-in-law of Leonidas king of Sparta, who, for a while, uſurped the kingdom, after the expulſion of his father-in-law. When Leonidas was recalled, Cleombrotus was baniſhed; and his wife, Chelonis, who had accompanied her father, now accompanied her huſband in his exile. Pauſ. 3, c. 6.—Plut. in Ag. & Cleom.——A youth of Ambracia, who killed himſelf after reading Plato's treatiſe upon the immortality of the ſoul. Cic. in Tuſc. 1, c. 34.—Ovid. in Ib. 493.

CLEOMĒDES, a famous athlete of Aſtypalæa, above Crete. In a combat at Olympia, he killed one of his antagoniſts by a blow with his fiſt. On account of this accidental murder, he was deprived of the victory, and he became delirious. In his return to Aſtypalæa, he entered a ſchool, and pulled down the pillars which ſupported the roof, and cruſhed to death 60 boys. He was purſued with ſtones, and he fled for ſhelter into a tomb, whoſe doors he ſo ſtrongly ſecured, that his purſuers were obliged to break them for acceſs. When the tomb was opened, Cleomedes could not be found either dead or alive. The oracle of Delphi was conſulted, and gave this anſwer, Ultimus heroum Cleomedes Aſtypalæus. Upon this they offered ſacrifices to him as a god. Pauſ. 6, c. 9.—Plut. in Rom.

CLEOMĒNES,

Cleomenes 1ſt, king of Sparta, conquered the Argives, and burnt 5000 of them by ſetting fire to a grove where they had fled, and freed Athens from the tyranny of the Piſiſtratidæ. By bribing the oracle, he pronounced Demaratus, his colleague on the throne, illegitimate, becauſe he refuſed to puniſh the people of Ægina, who had deſerted the Greeks. He killed himſelf in a fit of madneſs, 491 B. C. Herodot. 5, 6, & 7.—Pauſ. 8, c. 3, &c.——The 2d, ſucceeded his brother Ageſipolis 2d. He reigned 61 years in the greateſt tranquillity, and was father to Acrotatus and Cleonymus, and was ſucceeded by Areus 1ſt, ſon of Acrotatus. Pauſ. 3, c. 6.——The 3d, ſucceeded his father Leonidas. He was of an enterprizing ſpirit, and reſolved to reſtore the ancient diſcipline of Lycurgus in its full force, by baniſhing luxury and intemperance. He killed the Ephori, and removed by poiſon his royal colleague Eurydamides, and made his own brother, Euclidas, king, againſt the laws of the ſtate, which forbade more than one of the ſame family to ſit on the throne. He made war againſt the Achæans, and attempted to deſtroy their league. Aratus, the general of the Achæans, who ſuppoſed himſelf inferior to his enemy, called Antigonus to his aſſiſtance; and Cleomenes, when he had fought the unfortunate battle of Sellaſia, B. C. 222, retired into Egypt, to the court of Ptolemy Evergetes, where his wife and children had gone before him. Ptolemy received him with great cordiality; but his ſucceſſor, weak and ſuſpicious, ſoon expreſſed his jealouſy of this noble ſtranger, and impriſoned him. Cleomenes killed himſelf, and his body was flea'd, and expoſed on a croſs, B. C. 219. Polyb. 6.—Plut. in vitâ.—Juſtin. 28, c. 4.——A man appointed by Alexander to receive the tributes of Egypt and Africa. Curt. 4, c. 8.——A man placed as arbitrator between the Athenians and the people of Megara.——An hiſtorian.——A dithyrambic poet of Rhegium.——A Sicilian, contemporary with Verres, whoſe licentiouſneſs and avarice he was fond of gratifying. Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 12.——A Lacedæmonian general.

Cleonymus, a ſon of Cleomenes 2d, who called Pyrrhus to his aſſiſtance, becauſe Areus, his brother's ſon, had been preferred to him in the ſucceſſion; but the meaſure was unpopular, and even the women united to repel the foreign prince. His wife was unfaithful to his bed; and committed adultery with Acrotatus. Plut. in Pyrrh.—Pauſ. 1, c. 3.——A general who aſſiſted the Tarentines, and was conquered by Æmylius the Roman conſul. Strab. 6.

Cleopater, an officer of Aratus.

Cleopatra, the grand-daughter of Attalus, betrothed to Philip of Macedonia, after he had divorced Olympias. When Philip was murdered by Pauſanias, Cleopatra was ſeized by order of Olympias, and put to death. Diod. 16.—Juſtin. 9, c. 7.—Plut. in Pyrrh.——A ſiſter of Alexander the Great, who married Perdiccas, and was killed by Antigonus, as ſhe attempted to fly to Ptolemy in Egypt. Diod. 16 & 20.—Juſtin. 9, c. 6. l. 13, c. 6.——A harlot of Claudius Cæſar.——A daughter of Boreas. [Vid. Cleobula.]——A daughter of Idas and Marpeſſa, daughter of Evenus, king of Ætolia. She married Meleager, ſon of king Œneus. Homer. Il. 9, v. 552.—Pauſ. 4, c. 2.——One of the Danaïdes. Apollod. 2, c. 1.——A daughter of Amyntas of Epheſus. Pauſ. 1, c. 44.——A wife of Tigranes, king of Armenia, ſiſter of Mithridates. Juſtin. 38, v. 3.

v. 3.——A daughter of Tros and Callirhoe. Apollod. 3, c. 12.——A daughter of Ptolemy Philometor, who married Alexander Bala, and afterwards Nicanor. She killed Seleucus, Nicanor's son, because he ascended the throne without her consent. She was suspected of preparing poison for Antiochus her son, and compelled to drink it herself, B. C. 120.——A wife and sister of Ptolemy Evergetes, who raised her son Alexander, a minor, to the throne of Egypt, in preference to his elder brother, Ptolemy Lathurus, whose interest the people favored. As Alexander was odious, Cleopatra suffered Lathurus to ascend the throne, on condition, however, that he should repudiate his sister and wife, called Cleopatra, and marry Seleuca, his younger sister. She afterwards raised her favorite, Alexander, to the throne; but her cruelties were so odious, that he fled to avoid her tyranny. Cleopatra laid snares for him; and when Alexander heard it, he put her to death. Justin. 39, c. 3 & 4 ——A queen of Egypt, daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, and sister and wife to Ptolemy Dionysius, celebrated for her beauty and her cunning. She admitted Cæsar to her arms, to influence him to give her the kingdom, in preference to her brother, who had expelled her, and had a son by him, called Cæsarion. As she had supported Brutus, Antony, in his expedition to Parthia, summoned her to appear before him. She dressed herself in the most magnificent apparel, and appeared before her judge in the most captivating attire. Her artifice succeeded; Antony became enamoured of her, and publicly married her, forgetful of his connections with Octavia, the sister of Augustus. He gave her the greatest part of the eastern provinces of the Roman empire. This behaviour was the cause of a rupture between Augustus and Antony; and these two celebrated Romans met at Actium, where Cleopatra, by flying with sixty sail, ruined the interest of Antony, and he was defeated. Cleopatra had retired to Egypt, where soon after Antony followed her. Antony killed himself upon the false information that Cleopatra was dead; and as his wound was not mortal, he was carried to the queen, who drew him by a cord from one of the windows of the monument, where she had retired. Antony soon after died of his wounds; and Cleopatra, after she had received pressing invitations from Augustus, and even pretended declarations of love, destroyed herself by the bite of an asp, not to fall into the conqueror's hands. She had previously attempted to stab herself, and had once made a resolution to starve herself. Cleopatra was a voluptuous and extravagant woman, and, in one of the feasts she gave to Antony at Alexandria, she melted pearls into her drink. She was fond of appearing dressed as the goddess Isis; and she advised Antony, to make war against the richest nations, to support her debaucheries. Her beauty has been greatly commended, and it is said that she could give audience to the ambassadors of seven different nations, and speak their various languages as fluently as her own. In Antony's absence, she repaired the public library of Alexandria, with the addition of that of Pergamus. Two treatises, de medicamine faciei epistolæ eroticæ, and de morbis mulierum, have been falsely attributed to her; and she died B. C. 30 years, after a reign of 24 years. Egypt became a Roman province at her death. Flor. 4, c. 11.—Appian. 5. bell. civ. Plut. in Pomp. & Ant.—Hor. 1, od. 37, v. 21, &c.—Strab. 17.——A daughter of Ptolemy Epiphanes, who married Philometor, and afterwards Physcon of Cyrene.

CLITUS, a familiar friend and foſter-brother of Alexander. He had ſaved the king's life in a bloody battle. Alexander killed him with a javelin, in a fit of anger, when he was intoxicated; becauſe, at a feaſt, he preferred the actions of Philip to thoſe of his ſon. Alexander was inconſolable for the loſs of a friend, whom he had ſacrificed in the hour of drunkenneſs and diſſipation. Juſtin. 12, c. 6.—Plut. in Alex.—Curt. 4, &c.——A commander of Polyperchon's ſhips, defeated by Antigonus. Diod. 18.——An officer ſent by Antipater, with 240 ſhips againſt the Athenians, whom he conquered near the Echinades. Diod. 18.——A Trojan prince, killed by Teucer.——A diſciple of Ariſtotle, who wrote a book on Miletus.

CLOACĪNA, a goddeſs at Rome, who preſided over the Cloacæ. Some ſuppoſe her to be Venus. The Cloacæ were large receptacles for the filth and dung of the whole city, begun by Tarquin the elder, and finiſhed by Tarquin the proud. They were built all under the city; ſo that, according to an expreſſion of Pliny, Rome ſeemed to be ſuſpended between heaven and earth. The building was ſo ſtrong, and the ſtones ſo large, that though they were continually waſhed by impetuous torrents, they remained unhurt during above 700 years. There were public officers choſen to take care of the Cloacæ, called Curatores Cloacarum urbis.

CLODIA LEX ae Cypro, was enacted by the tribune Clodius, A. U. C. 695, to reduce Cyprus into a Roman province, and expoſe Ptolemy king of Egypt to ſale in his regal ornaments. It empowered Cato to go with the prætorian power, and ſee the auction of the king's goods, and commiſſioned him to return the money to Rome —— Another, de Magiſtratibus, A. U. C. 695, by Clodius the tribune. It forbade the cenſors to put a ſtigma or mark of infamy upon any perſon who had not been actually accuſed and condemned by both the cenſors. ——Another, de Religione, by the ſame, A. U. C. 696, to deprive the prieſt of Cybele, a native of Peſcinum, of his office, and confer the prieſthood upon Brotigonus, a Gallogrecian.——Another, de Provinciis, A. U. C. 695, which nominated the provinces of Syria, Babylon, and Perſia, to the conſul Gabinus; and Achaia, Theſſaly, Macedon, and Greece, to his colleague Piſo, with pro conſular power. It empowered them to defray the expences of their march from the public treaſury.——Another, A. U. C. 695, which required the ſame diſtribution of corn among the people gratis, as had been given them before at ſix aſſes and a triens the buſhel.——Another, A. U. C. 695, by the ſame, de Judiciis. It called to an account, ſuch as had executed a Roman citizen without a judgment of the people, and all the formalities of a trial.—Another, by the ſame, to pay no attention to the appearances of the heavens, while any affair was before the people.——Another, to make the power of the tribunes free, in making and propoſing laws.——Another, to re-eſtabliſh the companies of artiſts, which had been inſtituted by Numa; but ſince his time aboliſhed.

CLODII FORUM, a town of Italy. Plin. 3, c. 15.

PB. CLODIUS, a Roman, deſcended of an illuſtrious family. He made himſelf famous for his licentiouſneſs, avarice and ambition. He committed inceſt with his three ſiſters, and introduced himſelf in women's cloaths into the houſe of J. Cæſar, whilſt Pompeia, Cæſar's wife, of whom he was enamoured, was celebrating the myſteries of Ceres, where no man was permitted to appear. He was accuſed for this violation of human and divine laws; but he corrupted his judges, and by that means ſcreened himſelf from juſtice. He deſcended from a Patrician into a plebeian family to become a tribune. He was ſuch an enemy to Cato, that, he made him go with prætorian power, in an expedition againſt Ptolemy king of Cyprus, that, by the difficulty of the campaign, he might ruin his reputation, and deſtroy his intereſt at Rome during his abſence. Cato, however, by his uncommon ſucceſs, fruſtrated the views of Clodius. He was alſo an inveterate enemy to Cicero; and, by his influence, he baniſhed him from Rome, partly on pretence that he had puniſhed with death, and without trial, the adherents of Catiline. He wreaked his vengeance upon Cicero's houſe, which he burnt, and ſet all his goods to ſale; which, however, to his great mortification, no one offered to buy. In ſpite of Clodius, Cicero was recalled, and all his goods reſtored to him. Clodius was ſome time after murdered by Milo, whoſe defence Cicero took upon himſelf. Plut. in Cic.—Appian. de Civ. 2. —Cic. pro Milon. & pro domo.—Dio.——A certain author, quoted by Plut.——Licinius, wrote an hiſtory of Rome. Liv. 29, c. 22. ——Quirinalis, a rhetorician in Nero's age. Tacit. 1, Hiſt. c. 7.——Sextus, a rhetorician of Sicily, intimate with M. CLYTEMNESTRA, a daughter of Tyndarus king of Sparta, by Leda. She was born together, with her brother Caſtor, from one of the eggs which her mother brought forth after her amour with Jupiter, under the form of a ſwan. Clytemneſtra married Agamemnon king of Argos. She had before married Tantalus, ſon of Thyeſtes, according to ſome authors. When Agamemnon went to the Trojan war, he left his couſin Ægyſthus to take care of his wife, of his family, and all his domeſtic affairs. Beſides this, a certain favorite muſician was appointed by Agamemnon, to watch over the conduct of the guardian, as well as that of Clytemneſtra. In the abſence of Agamemnon, Ægyſthus made his court to Clytemneſtra, and publicly lived with her. Her infidelity reached the ears of Agamemnon, before the walls of Troy, and he reſolved to take full revenge upon the adulterers at his return. He was prevented from putting his ſchemes into execution; Clytemneſtra, with her adulterer, murdered him at his arrival, as he came out of the bath, or, according to other accounts, as he ſat down at a feaſt prepared to celebrate his happy return. Caſſandra, whom Agamemnon had brought from Troy, ſhared his fate; and Oreſtes would alſo have been deprived of life, like his father, had not his ſiſter Electra removed him from the reach of Clytemneſtra. After this murder, Clytemneſtra publicly married Ægyſthus, and he aſcended the throne of Argos. Oreſtes, after an abſence of ſeven years, returned to Mycenæ, reſolved to avenge his father's murder. He concealed himſelf in the houſe of his ſiſter Electra, who had been married by the adulterers, to a perſon of mean extraction and circumſtances. His death was publicly announced; and when Ægyſthus and Clytemneſtra repaired to the temple of Apollo, to return thanks to the god, for the death of the ſurviving ſon of Agamemnon, Oreſtes, with his faithful friend Pylades, hid himſelf in the temple, and ruſhed upon the adulterers, and killed them with his own hand. They were buried without the walls of the city, as their bones were not worthy to be laid in the ſepulchre of Agamemnon. Vid. Ægyſthus, Agamemnon, Oreſtes, Electra.—Diod. 4.—*Homer. Doves diſappeared once every year at Eryx, where Venus had a temple, and they were ſaid to accompany the goddeſs to Libya, whither ſhe went to paſs nine days, after which they returned. Doves were ſuppoſed to give oracles in the oaks of the foreſt of Dodona. Tibull. 1, el. 7, v. 17.—Ælian. V. H. 1, c. 15.

Columella, (L. Jun. Moderatus), a native of Gades, who wrote twelve books on agriculture, of which, the tenth, on gardening, is in verſe. The ſtyle is elegant, and the work diſplays the genius of a naturaliſt, and the labors of an accurate obſerver.

Columnæ Hercŭlis, a name given to two mountains on the extremeſt parts of Spain and Africa, at the entrance into the Mediterranean. They were called Calpe and Abyla, the former on the coaſt of Spain, and the latter on the ſide of Africa, at the diſtance of only 18 miles. They are reckoned the boundaries of the labors of Hercules, and they were ſuppoſed to have been joined, till the hero ſeparated them, and opened a communication between the Mediterranean and Atlantic ſeas.

Colŭthus, a native of Lycopolis in Egypt, who wrote a poem on the rape of Helen,

Helen, in imitation of Homer. The compoſition remained long unknown, till it was diſcovered at Lycopolis in the 15th century, by the learned cardinal Beſſarion. Coluthus was, as ſome ſuppoſe, a contemporary of Tryphiodorus.

Colyttus, a tribe in Athens.

Comagēna, a part of Syria above Cilicia, on the eaſt, extending as far as the Euphrates. Strab. 11 & 17.

Comāna, (orum), a city of Cappadocia, famous for a temple of Bellona, where there were above 6000 miniſters of both ſexes. The chief prieſt among them was very powerful, and knew no ſuperior but the king of the country. This high office was generally conferred upon one of the royal family. Flacc. 7, v. 636.—Strab. 12.

Cometho, a daughter of Pterilaus, who deprived her father of a golden hair in his head, upon which depended his fate. She was put to death by Amphitryon for her perfidy. Apollod. 2, c. 4.

Q. Cominius, a Roman knight, who wrote ſome illiberal verſes againſt Tiberius. Tacit. 4, Ann. c. 31.

Comitia, (orum), an aſſembly of the Roman people. The word is derived from Comitium, the place where they were convened, quaſi a cum eundo. The Comitium was a large hall, which was left uncovered at the top, in the firſt ages of the republic; ſo that the aſſembly was often diſſolved in rainy weather. The Comitia were called, ſome conſularia, for the election of the conſuls; others prætoria, for the election of prætors, &c. Theſe aſſemblies were more generally known by the name of Comitia, Curiata, Centuriata, and Tributa. The Curiata was when the people gave their votes by curiæ. Theſe Centuriata were not convened in later times. (Vid. Centuria.) Another aſſembly was called Comitia tributa, where the votes were received from the whole tribes together. At firſt the Roman people were divided only into three tribes; but as their numbers increaſed, the tribes were at laſt ſwelled to 35. The object of theſe aſſemblies was the electing of magiſtrates and all the public officers of ſtate. They could be diſſolved by one of the tribunes, if he differed in opinion from the reſt of his colleagues. If one among the people was taken with the falling ſickneſs, the whole aſſembly was immediately diſſolved, whence that diſeaſe is called morbus comitalis. After the cuſtom of giving their votes vivâ voce had been aboliſhed, every one of the aſſembly, in enacting of a law, was preſented with two ballots, on one of which were the letters U. R. that is uti rogas, be it as it is required; on the other was an A. that is antiquo, which bears the ſame meaning as antiquam volo, I forbid it, the old law is more preferable. If the number of ballots with U. R. was ſuperior to the A's, the law was approved conſtitutionally; if not, it was rejected. Only the chief magiſtrates, and ſometimes the pontifices, had the privilege of convening theſe aſſemblies. There were only theſe eight of the magiſtrates who had the power of propoſing a law, the conſuls, the dictator, the prætor, the interrex, the decemvirs, the military tribunes, the kings, and the triumvirs. Theſe were called majores magiſtratus; to whom one of the minores magiſtratus was added, the tribune of the people.

Comius, a man appointed king over the Attrebates, by J. Cæſar, for his ſervices. Cæſ. bell. G. 4, c. 21.

Commŏdus, (L. Aurelius Antoninus) ſon of M. Antoninus, ſucceeded his father in the Roman empire. He was naturally cruel, and fond of indulging his licentious propenſities, and regardleſs of the inſtructions of philoſophers, and of the decencies of nature, he corrupted his own ſiſters, and kept 300 women, and as many boys, for his illicit pleaſures. Deſirous to be called Hercules, like that hero, he adorned his ſhoulders with a lion's ſkin, and armed his hand with a knotted club. He ſhowed himſelf naked in public, and fought with the gladiators, and boaſted of his dexterity in killing the wild beaſts in the amphitheatre. He required divine honors from the ſenate, and they were granted. He was wont to put ſuch an immenſe quantity of gold duſt in his hair, that when he appeared bare-headed in the ſunſhine, his head glittered as if ſurrounded with ſun-beams. Martia, one of his concubines, whoſe death he had prepared, poiſoned him; but as the poiſon did not quickly operate, he was ſtrangled by a wreſtler. He died in the 31ſt year of his age, and the 13th of his reign, A. D. 192. It has been obſerved, that he never truſted himſelf to a barber, but always burnt his beard, in imitation of the tyrant Dionyſius. Herodian.

COMON, a general of Meſſenia. Pauſ. 4. c. 26.

COMPĬTĀLIA, feſtivals celebrated by the Romans the 12th of January and the 6th of March, in the croſs ways, in honor of the houſehold gods called Lares. Tarquin the Proud firſt inſtituted them, on account of an oracle which ordered him to offer heads to the Lares. He ſacrificed to them human victims; but J. Brutus, after the expulſion of the Tarquins, thought it ſufficient to offer them only poppy heads, and men of ſtraw. The ſlaves were generally the miniſters, and, during the celebration, they enjoyed their freedom. Varro. de L. L. 5, c. 3.—Ovid. Faſt. 5, v. 140.—Dionyſ. Hal. 4.

COMPSATUS, a river of Thrace, falling into the lake Biſtonis. Herodot. 7, c. 109.

COMPUSA, a town of Bithynia.

COMUS, the god of revelry, feaſting, and nocturnal entertainments. During his feſtivals, men and women exchanged each other's dreſs. He was repreſented as a young and drunken man, with a garland of flowers on his head, and a torch in his hand, which ſeemed falling. He is more generally ſeen ſleeping upon his legs, and turning himſelf when the heat of the falling torch ſcorched his ſide. Philoſtrat. 2, Icon. Plut. Queſt. Rom.

CONCANI, a people of Spain, who lived chiefly on milk mixed with horſe's blood. Horat. 3, od. 4, v. 34.

CONCORDIA, the goddeſs of peace and concord at Rome, to whom Camillus firſt raiſed a temple in the capitol, where the magiſtrates often aſſembled for the tranſaction of public buſineſs. She had, beſides this, other temples and ſtatues, and was addreſſed to promote the peace and union of families, and citizens. Plut. in Camill.—Plin. 33, c. 1.—Cic. pro Domo.

CONNĪDAS, the preceptor of Theſeus, in whoſe honor the Athenians inſtituted a feſtival called Connidcia. It was then uſual to ſacrifice to him a ram. Plut. in Theſ.

CONON, a famous general of Athens, ſon of Timotheus. He was made governor of all the iſlands of the Athenians, and was defeated in a naval battle by Lyſander, near the Ægoſpotamos. He retired in voluntary baniſhment to Evagoras king of Cyprus, and afterwards to Artaxerxes king of Perſia, by whoſe aſſiſtance he freed his country from ſlavery. He defeated the Spartans near Cnidos, in an engagement where Piſander, the enemy's admiral, was killed. By his means the Athenians fortified their city with a ſtrong wall, and attempted to recover Ionia and Æolia. He was perfidiouſly betrayed by a Perſian, and died in priſon, B. C. 393. C. Nep. in vitâ.—Plut. in Lyſ. & Artax.—Iſocrates.——A Greek aſtronomer of Samos, who, to gain the favor of Ptolemy Evergetes, publicly declared that the queen's locks, which had been dedicated in the temple of Venus, and had ſince diſappeared, were become a conſtellation. He was intimate with Archimedes, and floriſhed 247 B. C. Catull. 67.—Virg. Ecl. 3, v. 40.—A Grecian mythologiſt, in the age of Julius Cæſar, who wrote a book which contained 40 fables, ſtill extant.——There was a treatiſe written on Italy by a man of the ſame name.

CONSENTES, the name which the Romans gave to the twelve ſuperior gods, the Dii majorum gentium. The word ſignifies as much as conſentientes, that is, who conſented to the deliberations of Jupiter's council. They were twelve in number, whoſe names Ennius has briefly expreſſed in theſe lines:

Juno, Veſta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercurius, Jovi, Neptunus, Vulcanus, Apollo.

Constans, a ſon of Conſtantina. Vid. Conſtantinus.

Constantia, a grand-daughter of the great Conſtantine, who married the emperor Gratian.

Constantina, a princeſs, wife of the emperor Gallus.——Another.

Constantinopŏlis, formerly Byzantium, the capital of Thrace, a noble and magnificent city, built by Conſtantine the Great, and ſolemnly dedicated A. D. 330. It was the capital of the eaſtern Roman empire, and was called, after its foundation, Roma nova, on account of its greatneſs, which ſeemed to rival Rome. The beauty of its ſituation, with all its conveniences, have been the admiration of every age. Conſtantinople fell into the hands of Mahomet the 2d, the 28th of May 1453.

Constantīnus, ſirnamed the Great, from the greatneſs of his exploits, was ſon of Conſtantius. As ſoon as he became independent, he aſſumed the title of Auguſtus, and made war againſt Licinius, his brother-in-law, and colleague on the throne, becauſe he was cruel and ambitious. He conquered him, and obliged him to lay aſide the imperial power. It is ſaid, that as he was going to fight againſt Maxentius, one of his rivals, he ſaw a croſs in the ſky, with this inſcription, ἐν τούτῳ νίκα in hoc vince. From this circumſtance he became a convert to chriſtianity, and obtained an eaſy victory, ever after adopting a croſs or labarum as his ſtandard. After the death of Diocletian, Maximian, Maxentius, Maximinus, and Lucinius, who had reigned together, though in a ſubordinate manner, Conſtantine became ſole emperor, and began to reform the ſtate. He founded a city in a moſt eligible ſituation, where old Byzantium formerly ſtood, and called it by his own name, Conſtantinopolis. Thither he tranſported part of the Roman ſenate; and by keeping his court there, he made it the rival of Rome, in population and magnificence. From that time the two imperial cities began to look upon each other with an eye of envy; and ſoon after the age of Conſtantine, a ſeparation was made of the two empires, and Rome was called the capital of the weſtern, and Conſtantinopolis was called the capital of the eaſtern, dominions of Rome. The emperor has been diſtinguiſhed for perſonal courage, and praiſed for the protection he extended to the chriſtians. He at firſt perſecuted the Arians, but afterwards inclined to their opinions; and his murder of his ſon Criſpus has been deſervedly cenſured. By removing the Roman legions from the garriſons on the rivers, he opened an eaſy paſſage to the Barbarians, and rendered his ſoldiers unwarlike. He defeated 100,000 Goths, and received into his territories 300,000 Sarmatians, who had been baniſhed by their ſlaves, and gave them ground to cultivate. Conſtantine was learned, and preached, as well as compoſed, many ſermons, one of which remains. He died A. D. 337, after a reign of 31 years of the greateſt glory and ſucceſs. He left three ſons, Conſtantinus, Conſtans, and Conſtantius, among whom he divided his empire. The firſt, who had Gaul, Spain, and Britain for his portion, was conquered by the armies of his brother Conſtans, and killed in the 25th year of his age, A. D. 340. Magnentius, the governor of the provinces of Rhætia, murdered Conſtans in his bed, after a reign of 13 years, over Italy, Africa, and Illyricum; and Conſtantius, the only ſurviving brother, now become the ſole emperor, A. D. 353, puniſhed his brother's murderer, and gave way to cruelty and oppreſſion. He viſited Rome, where he diſplayed a triumph, and died in his march againſt Julian, who had been proclaimed independent emperor by his ſoldiers.——The name of Conſtantine was very common to the emperors of the eaſt, in a later period. ——A private ſoldier in Britain, raiſed on account of his name, to the imperial dignity. ——A general of Beliſarius.

Constantius Chlorus, ſon of Eutropius, and father of the great Conſtantine, merited the title of Cæſar, which he obtained, by his victories in Britain and Germany. He became the colleague of Galerius, on the abdication of Diocleſian; and after bearing the character of a humane and benevolent prince, he died at York, and made his ſon his ſucceſſor, A. D. 306.——The ſecond ſon of Conſtantine the Great. Vid. Conſtantinus.——The father of Julian and Gallus, was ſon of Conſtantius by Theodora, and died A. D. 337.——A Roman general of Nyſſa, who married Placidia, the ſiſter of Honorius, and was proclaimed emperor, an honor he enjoyed only ſeven months. He died univerſally regretted, 421 A. D. and was ſucceeded by his ſon Valentinian in the weſt.——One of the ſervants of Attila.

Consŭales Ludi or Consŭalia, feſtivals at Rome in honor of Conſus, the god of counſel, whoſe altar Romulus diſcovered under the ground. This altar was always covered, except at the feſtival, when a mule was ſacrificed, and games and horſe-races exhibited in honor of Neptune. It was during theſe feſtivals that Romulus carried away the Sabine women who had aſſembled to be ſpectators of the games. They were firſt inſtitut-ed by Romulus. Some ſay that Romulus only regulated and re-inſtituted them after they had been before eſtabliſhed by Evander. During the celebration, which happened about the middle of Auguſt, the horſes were exempted from all labors, and were led through the ſtreets adorned with garlands and flowers.

CONSUL, a magiſtrate at Rome, with regal authority for the ſpace of one year. There were two conſuls, a conſulendo, and annually choſen in the Campus Martius. The two firſt conſuls were L. Jun. Brutus, and L. Tarquinius Collatinus, choſen A. U. C. 244, after the expulſion of the Tarquins. In the firſt times of the republic, the two conſuls were always choſen from Patrician families, or noblemen; but the people obtained the privilege, A. U. C. 388, of electing one of the conſuls from their own body; and ſometimes both were plebeians. The firſt conſul among the plebeians was L. Sextius. It was required that every candidate for the conſulſhip ſhould be 43 years of age, called legitimum tempus. He was always to appear at the election as a private man, without a retinue; and it was requiſite, before he canvaſſed for the office, to have diſcharged the functions of quæſtor, edile, and prætor. Sometimes theſe qualifications were diſregarded. Val. Corvinus was made a conſul in his 23d year, and Scipio in his 24th. Young Marius, Pompey, and Auguſtus, were alſo under the proper age when they were inveſted with the office, and Pompey had never been quæſtor or prætor. The power of the conſuls was unbounded, and they knew no ſuperior but the gods and the laws; but after the expiration of their office, their conduct was minutely ſcrutinized by the people, and miſbehavior was often puniſhed by the laws. The badges of their office was the prætexta, a robe fringed with purple, afterwards exchanged for the toga picta or palmata. They were preceded by 12 lictors, carrying the faſces or bundle of ſticks, in the middle of which appeared an ax. The ax, as being the characteriſtic rather of tyranny than of freedom, was taken away from the faſces by Valerius Poplicola, but it was reſtored by his ſucceſſor. They took it by turns, monthly, to be preceded by the lictors while at Rome, leſt the appearance of two perſons with the badges of royal authority, ſhould raiſe apprehenſions in the multitude. While one appeared publicly in ſtate, only a crier walked before the other, and the lictors followed behind without the faſces. Their authority was equal; yet the Valerian law gave the right of priority to the older, and the Julian law to him who had the moſt children, and he was generally called conſul major or prior. As their power was abſolute, they preſided over the ſenate, and could convene and diſmiſs it at pleaſure. The ſenators were their counſellors; and among the Romans, the manner of reckoning their years was by the name of the conſuls, and by M. Tul. Cicerone & L. Antonio, Conſulibus for inſtance, the year of Rome 689 was always underſtood. This cuſtom laſted from the year of Rome 244 till the year 1294, or 541ſt year of the chriſtian era, when the conſular office was totally ſuppreſſed by Juſtinian. In public aſſemblies the conſuls ſat in ivory chairs, and held in their hands an ivory wand, called ſcipio eburneus, which had an eagle on its top, as a ſign of dignity and power. When they had drawn by lot the provinces over which they were to preſide during their conſulſhip, they went to the capitol to offer their prayers to the gods, and entreat them to protect the republic: after this they departed from the city, arrayed in their military dreſs, and preceded by the lictors. Sometimes the provinces were aſſigned them, without drawing by lot, by the will and appointment of the ſenators. At their departure, they were provided by the ſtate with whatever was requiſite during their expedition. In their provinces they were both attended by the lictors, and equally inveſted with regal authority. They were not permitted to return to Rome without the ſpecial command of the ſenate, and they always remained in the province till the arrival of their ſucceſſor. At their return they harangued the people, and ſolemnly proteſted that they had done nothing againſt the laws or intereſt of their country, but had faithfully and diligently endeavoured to promote the greatneſs and welfare of the ſtate. No man could be conſul two following years; yet this inſtitution was ſometimes broken, and we find Marius re-elected conſul, after the expiration of his office, during the Cimbrian war. The office of conſul, ſo dignified during the times of the commonwealth, became a mere title under the emperors, and retained nothing of its authority but the uſeleſs enſigns of original dignity. Even the office of conſul, which was originally annual, was reduced to two or three months by J. Cæſar; but they who were admitted on the firſt of January denominated the year, and were called ordinarii. Their ſucceſſors, during the year, were diſtinguiſhed by the name of ſuffecti. Tiberius and Claudius abridged the time of the conſulſhip, and the emperor Commodus made no leſs than 25 conſuls in one year. Conſtantine the Great renewed the original inſtitution, and permitted them to be a whole year in office.——Here is annexed a liſt of the conſuls from the eſtabliſhment of the conſular power power to the battle of Actium, in which it may be ſaid that the authority of the conſuls was totally extinguiſhed.

The two firſt conſuls, choſen about the middle of June, A. U. C. 244, were L. Jun. Brutus, and L. Tarq. Collatinus. Collatinus retired from Rome as being of the family of the Tarquins, and Pub. Valerius was choſen in his room. When Brutus was killed in battle, Sp. Lucretius was elected to ſucceed him; and after the death of Lucretius, Marcus Horatius was choſen for the reſt of the year with Valerius Publicola. The firſt conſulſhip laſted about 16 months, during which the Romans fought againſt the Tarquins, and the capitol was dedicated.

Corinnus, an ancient poet in the time of the Trojan war, on which he wrote a poem. Homer, as some suppose, took his subject from the poem of Corinnus.

Corinthiacus sinus, is now called the gulph of Lepanto.

Corinthus, an ancient city of Greece, now called Corito, situated on the middle of the Isthmus of Corinth, at the distance of about 60 stadia on either side from the sea. It was first founded by Sisyphus son of Æolus, A. M. 2616, and received its name from Corinthus the son of Pelops. Its original name was Ephyre; and it is called Bimaris, because situate between the Saronicus Sinus and Crisseus Sinus. The inhabitants were once very powerful, and had great influence among the Grecian states. They colonized Syracuse in Sicily, and delivered it from the tyranny of its oppressors, by the means of Timoleon. Corinth was totally destroyed by L. Mummius, the Roman consul, and burnt to the ground, 146 B. C. The riches which the Romans found there, were immense. During the conflagration, all the metals which were in the city melted and mixed together, and formed that valuable composition of metals, which has since been known by the name of Corinthium Æs. There was there a famous temple of Venus, where many lascivious women resorted, and sold their pleasures so dear, that many of their lovers were reduced to poverty; whence the proverb of to shew that all voluptuous indulgences are attended with much expence. J. Cæsar planted a colony at Corinth, and endeavoured to restore it to its former grandeur. The government of Corinth was monarchical, till 779 years B. C. when officers called Prytanes were instituted. The war which has received the name of Corinthian war, because the battles were fought in the neighbourhood of Corinth, was begun B. C. 395, by the combination of the Athenians, nians, Thebans, Corinthians, and Argives, against Lacedæmon. Pisander and Agesilaus distinguished themselves in that war; the former, on the first year of hostilities, was defeated with the Lacedæmonian fleet, by Conon, near Cnidus; while a few days after, Agesilaus slaughtered 10,000 of the enemy. The most famous battles were fought at Coronea and Leuctra; but Agesilaus refused to besiege Corinth, lamenting that the Greeks, instead of destroying one another, did not turn their arms against the Persian power. Liv. 45. c. 28.—Flor. 2, c. 16.—*Ovid. Coriŏlanus, the surname of C. Martius, from his victory over Corioli, where, from a private soldier, he gained the amplest honors. When master of the place, he accepted as the only reward, the surname of Coriolanus, a horse, and prisoners, his ancient host, to whom he immediately gave his liberty. After a number of military exploits, and many services for his country, he was refused the consulship by the people, when his scars had for a while influenced them in his favor. This raised his resentment; and when the Romans had received a present of corn from Gelo king of Sicily, Coriolanus insisted that it should be sold for money, and not be given gratis. Upon this, the tribunes raised the people against him for his imprudent advice, and even wished him to be put to death. This rigorous sentence was stopped by the influence of the senators, and Coriolanus submitted to a trial. He was banished by a majority of three tribes, and he immediately retired among the Volsci, to Tullus Aufidius, his greatest enemy, from whom he met a most tender reception. He advised him to make war against Rome, and he marched at the head of the Volsci as general. The approach of Coriolanus greatly alarmed the Romans, who sent him several embassies, to reconcile him to his country, and to solicit his return. He was deaf to all proposals, and bade them prepare for war. He pitched his camp only at the distance of five miles from the city; and his enmity against his country would have been fatal, had not his mother Volumnia, and his wife Vergilia, been prevailed upon by the Roman matrons, to go and appease his resentment. The meeting of Coriolanus with his family was tender and affecting. He remained long inexorable; but at last the tears and entreaties of a mother and a wife prevailed over the stern and obstinate resolutions of an enemy, and Coriolanus marched the Volsci from the neighbourhood of Rome. To shew their sense of Volumnia's merit and patriotism, the Romans dedicated a temple to Female Fortune. The behaviour of Coriolanus displeased the Volsci. He was summoned to appear before the people of Antium; but the clamors which his enemies raised, were so prevalent, that he was murdered on the place appointed for his trial, B. C. 488. His body was honored with a magnificent funeral by the Volsci, and the Roman matrons put on mourning for his loss. Some historians say that he died in exile, in an advanced old age. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor. 2, c. 22.

Cornēlia lex, de Civitate, was enacted A. U. C. 670, by L. Corn. Sylla. It confirmed the Sulpician law, and required that the citizens of the eight newly elected tribes, should be divided among the 35 ancient tribes.——Another, de Judiciis, A. U. C. 673, by the same. It ordained that the prætor should always observe the same invariable method in judicial proceedings, and that the process should not depend upon his will.——Another, de Sumptibus, by the same. It limited the expences which generally attended funerals.——Another, de Religione, by the same, A. U. C. 677. It restored to the college of priests, the privilege of chusing the priests, which, by the Domitian law, had been lodged in the hands of the people.——Another, de Municipiis, by the same; which revoked all the privileges which had been some time before granted to the several towns that had assisted Marius and Cinna in the civil wars.——Another, de Magistratibus, by the same; which gave the power of bearing honors and being promoted before the legal age, to those who had followed the interest of Sylla, while the sons and partizans of his enemies, who had been proscribed, were deprived of the privilege of standing for any office in the state.——Another, de Magistratibus, by the same, A. U. C. 673. It ordained that no person should exercise the same office within ten years distance, or be invested with two different magistracies in one year.——Another, de Magistratibus, by the same, A. U. C. 673. It divested the tribunes of the privilege of making laws, interfering, holding aſſemblies, and receiving appeals. All ſuch as had been tribunes were incapable of holding any other office in the ſtate by that law.——Another, de Majeſtate, by the ſame, A. U. C. 670. It made it treaſon to lend an army out of a province, or engage in a war without orders, to influence the ſoldiers to ſpare or ranſom a captive general of the enemy, to pardon the leaders of robbers or pirates, or for the abſence of a Roman citizen, to a foreign court, without previous leave. The puniſhment was, aquæ & ignis interdictio.——Another by the ſame, which gave the power to a man accuſed of murder, either by poiſon, weapons, or falſe accuſations, and the ſetting fire to buildings, to chuſe whether the jury that tried him ſhould give their verdict clam or palam, vivâ voce or by ballots.——Another by the ſame, which made it aquæ & ignis interdictio to ſuch as were guilty of forgery, concealing and altering of wills, corruption, falſe accuſations, and the debaſing or counterfeiting of the public coin; all ſuch as were acceſſary to this offence, were deemed as guilty as the offender.——Another, de pecuniis repetundis, by which a man convicted of peculation or extortion in the provinces, was condemned to ſuffer the aquæ & ignis interdictio.——Another by the ſame, which gave the power to ſuch as were ſent into the provinces with any government, of retaining their command and appointment, without a renewal of it by the ſenate, as was before obſerved.——Another by the ſame, which ordained that the lands of proſcribed perſons ſhould be common, eſpecially thoſe about Volaterræ and Feſulæ in Etruria, which Sylla divided among his ſoldiers.——Another by C. Cornelius, tribune of the people, A. U. C. 686; which ordained that no perſon ſhould be exempted from any law, according to the general cuſtom, unleſs 200 ſenators were preſent in the ſenate; and no perſon thus exempted, could hinder the bill of his exemption from being carried to the people for their concurrence.——Another by Naſica, A. U. C. 582, to make war againſt Perſeus, ſon of Philip, king of Macedonia, if he did not give proper ſatisfaction to the Roman people.

Cornēlia, a daughter of Cinna, who was the firſt wife of J. Cæſar. She became mother of Julia, Pompey's wife, and was ſo affectionately loved by her huſband, that, at her death, he pronounced a funeral oration over her body. Plut. in Cæſ.——A daughter of Metellus Scipio, who married Pompey, after the death of her huſband P. Craſſus. She has been praiſed for her great virtues. When her huſband left her in the bay of Alexandria, to go to ſhore in a ſmall boat, ſhe ſaw him ſtabbed by Achillas, and heard his dying groans without the poſſibility of aiding him. She attributed all his misfortunes to his connection with her. Plut. in Pomp.——A daughter of Scipio Africanus, who was the mother of Tiberius and Caius Graechus. She was courted by a king; but ſhe preferred being the wife of a Roman citizen, to that of a monarch. Her virtues have been deſervedly commended, as well as the wholeſome principles ſhe inculcated in her two ſons. When a Campanian lady made once a ſhew of her jewels at Cornelia's houſe, and entreated her to favor her with a ſight of her own, Cornelia produced her two ſons, ſaying, Theſe are the only jewels of which I can boaſt. In her life-time, a ſtatue was raiſed to her, with this inſcription, Cornelia mater Gracchorum. Some of her epiſtles are preſerved. Plut. in Gracch.—Juv. 6, v. 167.—*Val. Coronis, a daughter of Phlegias, loved by Apollo. She became pregnant by her lover, who killed her on account of her criminal partiality to Iſchys the Theſſalian. According to ſome, Diana killed her, for her infidelity to her brother; and Mercury ſaved the child from her womb, as ſhe was on the burning pile. Others ſay, that ſhe brought forth her ſon, and expoſed him near Epidaurus, to avoid her father's reſentment; and they further mention, that Apollo had ſet a crow to watch her behaviour. The child was preſerved, and called Æſculapius; and the mother, after death, received divine honors, and had a ſtatue at Sicyon, in her ſon's temple, which was never expoſed to public view. Pauſ. 2, c. 26.——The daughter of Coronæus, king of Phocis, changed into a crow, by Minerva, when flying before Neptune. *Ovid. Corybantes, the prieſts of Cybele, called alſo Galli. In the celebration of their feſtivals, festivals, they beat their cymbals, and behaved as if delirious. They first inhabited on mount Ida, and from thence passed into Crete, and secretly brought up Jupiter. Some suppose that they receive their name from Corybas son of Jasus and Cybele, who first introduced the rites of his mother into Phrygia. There was a festival at Cnossus in Crete, called Corybantica, in commemoration of the Corybantes, who there educated Jupiter. Paus. 8, c. 37.——Diod. 5.——Horat. 1, od. 16. Virg. Ann. 11 & 13.——Another, who imagined he should marry Minerva, &c. Ælian. 12.

COTYTTO, the goddess of all debauchery, whose festivals, called Cotyttia, were celebrated by the Athenians, Corinthians, Thracians, &c. during the night. Her priests were called Baptæ, and nothing but debauchery and wantonness prevailed at the celebration. A festival of the same name was observed in Sicily, where the votaries of the goddess carried about boughs hung with cakes and fruit, which it was lawful for any person to pluck off. It was a capital punishment to reveal whatever was seen or done at these sacred festivals, and it cost Eupolis his life for an unseasonable reflection upon them. The goddess Cotytto is supposed to be the same as Proserpine. Horat. epod. 17, v. 58.—Juv. 2, v. 91.

CRASSUS, the grandfather of Crassus the Rich, who never laughed. Plin. 7, c. 19.——Publ. Licinius, a Roman high-priest, about 131 years, B. C. who went into Asia with an army against Aristonicus, where he was killed, and buried at Smyrna.——M. Licinius, a celebrated Roman, surnamed Rich, on account of his opulence. At first he was very circumscribed in his circumstances; but, by educating slaves, and selling them at a high price, he soon enriched himself. The cruelties of Cinna obliged him to leave Rome; and he retired to Spain, where he remained concealed for eight months. After Cinna's death he passed into Africa, and thence to Italy, where he served Sylla, and ingratiated himself in his favor. When the gladiators, with Spartacus at their head, had spread an universal alarm in Italy, and defeated some of the Roman generals, Crassus was sent against them. A battle was fought, in which Crassus slaughtered 12,000 of the slaves, and, by this decisive blow, soon put an end to the war, and was honored with an ovatio at his return. He was soon after made consul with Pompey; and in this high office he displayed his opulence, by entertaining the populace at 10,000 tables. He was afterwards censor, and formed the first triumvirate with Pompey and Cæsar. As his love of riches was more predominant than that of glory, Crassus never imitated the ambitious conduct of his colleagues, but was satisfied with the province of Syria, which seemed to promise an inexhaustible source of wealth. With hopes of enlarging his possessions, he set off from Rome, though the omens proved unfavorable, and every thing seemed to threaten his ruin. He crossed the Euphrates, and, forgetful of the rich cities of Babylon and Seleucia, he hastened to make himself master of Parthia. He was betrayed in his march by the delay of Artavasdes, king of Armenia, and the perfidy of Artemnes. He was met in a large plain by Surena, the general of the forces of Orodes, king of Parthia; and a battle was fought, in which, 20,000 Romans were killed, and 10,000 taken prisoners. The darkness of the night favored the escape of the rest, and Crassus, forced by the mutiny and turbulence of his soldiers, and the treachery of his guides, trusted himself to the general of the enemy, on pretence of proposing terms of accommodation, and he was put to death, B. C. 53. His head was cut off, and sent to Orodes, who poured melted lead down his throat, and insulted his misfortunes. The firmness with which Crassus received the news of his son's death, who perished in that expedition, has been deservedly commended; and the words that he uttered when he surrendered himself into the hands of Surena, equally claim our admiration. He was wont often to say, that no man ought to be accounted rich, if he could not maintain an army. Though he has been called avaricious, yet he showed himself always ready to lend money to his friends without interest. He was fond of philosophy, and his knowledge of history was great and extensive. Plutarch has written his life. Flor. 3, c. 11.——Publius, the son of the rich Crassus, went into Parthia with his father. When he saw himself surrounded by the enemy, and without any hope of escape, he ordered one of his men to run him through. His head was cut off, and showed with insolence to his father by the Parthians. Plut. in Crass.——L. Licinius, a celebrated Roman orator, commended by Cicero.——A son of Crassus the rich, killed in the civil wars, after Cæsar's death.

CRASTĪNUS, a man in Cæsar's army, killed at the battle of Pharsalia. Cæs. bell. G. 3, c. 99.

CRATAIS, the mother of Scylla.

CRATÆUS, conspired against Archelaus, &c.—Aristot.

CRATER, a bay of Campania near Misenus.

CRATĔRUS, one of Alexander's generals. He rendered himself conspicuous by his literary fame, as well as by his valor in the field, and wrote the history of Alexander's life. He was greatly respected and loved by the Macedonian soldiers, and Alexander always trusted him with much confidence. After Alexander's death, he subdued Greece with Antipater, and passed with his colleague into Asia, where he was killed in a battle against Eumenes, B. C. 321. He had received for his share of Alexander's kingdoms, Greece and Epirus. Nep. in Eumen. 2.—Justin. 12 & 13.—Curt. 3.—Arrian.—Plut. in Alex.——A physician of Asia, mentioned by Cic. 12, ad Attic. ep. 13—Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 161.——A painter, Plin. 35, c. 11.——An Athenian, who collected into one body, all the decrees which had passed in the public assemblies at Athens.

CRATES, a philosopher of Bœotia, son of Ascondus, and disciple of Diogenes the Cynic, B. C. 324. He sold his estates, and gave the money to his fellow-citizens. He was naturally deformed, and he rendered himself more hideous, by sewing sheep's skins to his mantle, and by the singularity of his manners. He clothed himself as warm as possible in the summer: but in the winter, his garments were uncommonly thin, and incapable to resist the coldness of the season. Hipparchia, the sister of a philosopher, became enamoured of him; and as he could not cool her passion by representing himself as poor and deformed, he married her. He had by her two daughters, whom he gave in marriage to his disciples, after he had permitted them their company for 30 days, by way of trial. Some of his letters are extant. Diog. in vitâ.——A stoic, son of Timocrates, who opened a school at Rome, where he taught grammar. Sueton.——A native of Pergamus, who wrote an account of the most striking events of every age, B. C. 165. Ælian. de Anim. 17, c. 9.——A philosopher of Athens, who succeeded in the school of his master Polemon.——An Athenian comic poet.

CRATESICLĔA, the mother of Cleomenes, who went to Egypt, in hopes of serving her country, &c. Plut. in Cleom.

CRATESIPŎLIS, a queen of Sicyon, who severely punished some of her subjects, who had revolted at the death of Alexander, her husband, &c. Polyæn. 8, c. 58.

CRATESIPPIDAS, a commander of the Lacedæmonian fleet, against the Athenians, &c. Diod. 13.

CRATĔVAS, a general of Cassander. Diod. 19.

CRATEUS, a son of Minos.

CRATHIS, a river of Achaia, falling into the bay of Corinth. Strab. 8.——Another in Magna Græcia, whose waters give a yellow color to the hair and beard of those that drink them. Ovid. 14. Met. v. 315.—Paus. 7, c. 25.

CRATĪNUS, a native of Athens, celebrated for his comic writings, and his fondness for drinking. He died at the age of 97, B. C. 431 years. Quintilian greatly commends his comedies, which the little remains of his poetry do not seem fully to justify. Horat. 1. Sat. 4—Quintil.——A wrestler, of an uncommon beauty. Paus. 6, c. 3—A river of Asia. Plin. 37, c. 2.

CRATIPPUS, a philosopher of Mitylene, who taught Cicero's son at Athens, among others. After the battle of Pharsalia, Pompey visited the house of Cratippus, where their discourse was chiefly turned upon Providence, which the warrior blamed, and the philosopher defended. Plut. in Pomp.—Cic. in offic. 1.——An historian, contemporary with Thucydides. Dionys. Hal.

CRATĪLUS, a philosopher, preceptor to Plato after Socrates.

CRAUSIÆ, two islands on the coast of Peloponnesus.

CRAUXĪDAS, a man who obtained an Olympic crown at a horse race. Paus. 5, c. 8.

CRĔMĔRA, a small river of Tuscany, falling into the Tiber, famous for the death of the 300 Fabii, who were killed there, in a battle against the Veientes, A. U. C. 277. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 205.

CRIMMA, a town of Lycia.

CRIMMYON & CROMMYON, a town near Corinth, where Theseus killed a sow of of uncommon bigneſs. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 435.

Cremni & Cremnos, a commercial place on the Palus Mæotis. Herodot. 4, c. 2.

Cremona, a town of Ciſalpine Gaul, on the Po, near Mantua. It was a Roman colony, and ſuffered much when Annibal firſt paſſed into Italy. Liv. 21, c. 56.—Tacit. Hiſt. 3, & 4.

Cremonis Jugum, a part of the Alps, over which, as ſome ſuppoſe, Annibal paſſed to enter Italy. Liv. 21, c. 38.

Cremides, a place of Bithynia. Diod. 14.

Cremutius Cordus, an hiſtorian who wrote an account of Auguſtus, and of the civil wars, and ſtarved himſelf for fear of the reſentment of Tiberius, whom he had offended, by calling Caſſius the laſt of the Romans.

Creon, king of Corinth, was ſon of Syſiphus. He promiſed his daughter Glauce to Jaſon, who repudiated Medea. To revenge the ſucceſs of her rival, Medea ſent her for a preſent, a gown covered with poiſon. Glauce put it on, and was ſeized with ſudden pains. Her body took fire, and ſhe expired in the greateſt torments. The houſe alſo was conſumed by the fire, and Creon and his family ſhared Glauce's fate. Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 7.—Eurip. in Med.—Hygin. fab. 25.—Diod. 4.——A ſon of Menœtius, father to Jocaſta, the wife and mother of Œdipus. At the death of Laius, who had married Jocaſta, Creon aſcended the vacant throne of Thebes. As the ravages of the Sphinx (Vid. Sphinx) were intolerable, Creon offered his crown, and daughter in marriage, to him who could explain the enigmas which the monſter propoſed. Œdipus was happy in his explanations, and he aſcended the throne of Thebes, and married Jocaſta without knowing that ſhe was his mother, and by her he had two ſons, Polynices and Eteocles. Theſe two ſons mutually agreed, after their father's death, to reign in the kingdom, each alternately. Eteocles firſt aſcended the throne, by right of ſeniority; but when he was once in power, he refuſed to reſign at the appointed time, and his brother led againſt him an army of Argives to ſupport his right. The war was decided by a ſingle combat between the two brothers. They both killed one another, and Creon aſcended the throne, till Leodamas the ſon of Eteocles ſhould be of a ſufficient age to aſſume the reins of government. In his regal capacity, Creon commanded that the Argives, and more particularly Polynices, who was the cauſe of all the bloodſhed, ſhould remain unburied. If this was in any manner diſobeyed, the offenders were to be buried alive. Antigone, the ſiſter of Polynices, tranſgreſſed, and was accordingly puniſhed. Hæmon, the ſon of Creon, who was paſſionately fond of Antigone, killed himſelf on her grave, when his father refuſed to grant her pardon. Creon was afterwards killed by Theſeus, who had made war with him, becauſe he refuſed burial to the Argives. Vid. Eteocles, Polynices, Adraſtus, Œdipus.—Apollod. 3, c. 5, &c.—Pauſ. 1, c. 39. l. 9, c. 5, &c.—Stat. in Theb.—Sophocl. in Antig.—Æſchyl. Sept. ante Theb.—Hygin. fab. 67 & 76.—Diod. 1 & 4.——The firſt annual archon at Athens, 684 B. C. Pater. 1, c. 8.

Creontiades, a ſon of Hercules by Megara daughter of Creon, killed by his father, becauſe he had ſlain Lycus.

Creüsa, a daughter of Creon, king of Corinth. As she was going to marry Jason, who had divorced Medea, she put on a poisoned garment, which immediately set her body on fire, and she expired in the most excruciating torments. She had received this gown as a gift from Medea, who wished to take that revenge upon the infidelity of Jason. Some call her Glauce. Ovid. de Art. Am. 1, v. 335.——A daughter of Priam, king of Troy, by Hecuba. She married Æneas, by whom she had some children, among which was Ascanius. When Troy was taken, she fled in the night, with her husband; but they were separated in the midst of the confusion and tumult, and Æneas could not recover her, nor hear where she was. Cybele saved her, and carried her to her temple, of which she became priestess; according to the relation of Virgil, who makes Creusa appear to her husband in a vision, while he was seeking her in the tumult of war. She predicted to Æneas the calamities that attended him, the fame he should acquire when he came to Italy, and his consequent marriage with a princess of the country. Paus. 10, c. 16. —Virg. Æn. 2, v. 562, &c.——A daughter of Erechtheus king of Athens. She was mother of Janus by Apollo.——A town of Bœotia.

Crinippus, a general of Dionysius the elder.

Crinis, a stoic philosopher. Laert.——A priest of Apollo.

Crinisus & Crimisus, a river on the western parts of Sicily near Segesta, where Timoleon defeated the Carthaginian forces. C. Nep. in Tim.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 38.——The word in the various editions of Virgil, is spelt Cremissus, Crimissus, Crimisus, Crimesus, Crinisus, Crimnisus.

Crinisus, a Trojan prince, who exposed his daughter on the sea, rather than suffer her to be devoured by the sea-monster which Neptune sent to punish the infidelity of Laomedon. [Vid. Laomedon.] The daughter came safe to the shores of Sicily. Crinisus some time after went in quest of his daughter, and was so disconsolate for her loss, that the gods changed him into a river in Sicily, and granted him the power of metamorphosing himself into whatever shape he pleased. He made use of this privilege to seduce the neighbouring nymphs.

CRITŌGNATUS, a celebrated warrior of Aleſia, when Cæſar was in Gaul. Cæſ. bell. Gall.

CRITOLĀUS, a citizen of Tegea in Arcadia, who, with two brothers, fought againſt the two ſons of Demoſtratus of Pheneus, to put an end to a long war between their reſpective nations. The brothers of Critolaus were both killed, and he alone remained to withſtand his three bold antagoniſts. He conquered them; and when, at his return, his ſiſter deplored the death of one of his antagoniſts, to whom ſhe was betrothed, he killed her in a fit of reſentment. The offence deſerved capital puniſhment; but he was pardoned, on account of the ſervices he had rendered his country. He was afterwards general of the Achæans, and it is ſaid that he poiſoned himſelf, becauſe he had been conquered at Thermopylæ by the Romans. Cic. 3, de Nat. D.——A peripatetic philoſopher of Athens, ſent ambaſſador to Rome, &c. 140 B. C. Cic. 2, de Orat.——An hiſtorian who wrote about Epirus.

CROCUS, a beautiful youth enamoured of the nymph Smilax. He was changed into a flower of the ſame name, on account of the impatience of his love, and Smilax was metamorphoſed into a yew-tree. Ovid. Met. v. 283.

CRŒSUS, the fifth and laſt of the Mermnadæ, who reigned in Lydia, was ſon of Alyattes, and paſſed for the richeſt of mankind. He was the firſt who made the Greeks of Aſia tributary to the Lydians. His court was the aſylum of learning; and Æſop, the famous fable-writer, among others, lived under his patronage. In a converſation with Solon, he wiſhed to be thought the happieſt of mankind; but the philoſopher appriſed him of his miſtake, and gave the preference to poverty and domeſtic virtue. Crœſus undertook a war againſt Cyrus the king of Perſia, and marched to meet him with an army of 420,000 men, and 60,000 horſe. After a reign of 14 years, he was defeated, B. C. 548; his capital was beſieged, and he fell into the conqueror's hands, who ordered him to be burnt alive. The pile was already on fire, when Cyrus heard the conquered monarch three times exclaim, Solon! with uncommon energy. He aſked him the reaſon of his exclamation, and Crœſus repeated the converſation he had once had with Solon on human happineſs. Cyrus was moved at the recital, and at the recollection of the inconſtancy of human affairs, he ordered Crœſus to be taken from the burning pile, and he became one of his moſt intimate friends. The kingdom of Lydia was extinguiſhed in him, and the power was transferred to Perſia. Crœſus ſurvived Cyrus. The manner of his death is unknown. He is celebrated for the immenſely rich preſents which he made to the temple of Delphi, from which he received an obſcure and ambiguous oracle, which he interpreted in his favor, and which was fulfilled in the deſtruction of his empire. Herodot. 1, c. 26, &c.—Plut. in Solon. 8, c. 24.—Juſtin. 1, c. 7.

Ctesias, a Greek hiſtorian and phyſician of Cnidos, taken priſoner by Artaxerxes Mnemon at the battle of Cunaxa. He cured the king's wounds, and was his phyſician for 17 years. He wrote an hiſtory of the Aſſyrians and Perſians, which Juſtin and Diodorus have partially preferred to that of Herodotus. Some fragments of his compoſitions have been preſerved by Photius, and are to be found in Weſſeling's edition of Herodotus. Strab. 1, Athen. 11——Plut. in Artax.——A ſycophant of Athens.

Ctesibius, a mathematician of Alexandria, who floriſhed 135 years B. C. He was the inventor of the pump, and other hydraulic inſtruments. He alſo invented a clepſydra, or a water clock. This invention of meaſuring time by water was wonderful and ingenious. Water was let drop upon wheels, which it turned. The wheels communicated their regular motion to a ſmall wooden image, which, by a gradual riſe, pointed with a ſtick to the proper hours and months, which were engraved on a column near the machine. This artful invention gave riſe to many improvements; and the modern manner of meaſuring time with an hour-glaſs is in imitation of the clepſydra of Cteſibius. Vitruv. de Archit. 9, c. 9.——A cynic philoſopher.——An hiſtorian, who floriſhed 254 years B. C. and died in his 104th year. Plut. in Dem.

Sibyllæ*. Patere. 1, c. 4 Ptol. 3, v. 441.—Liv. 4.—Ptol. 3.—Strab. 5.

CUNAXA, a place of Aſſyria, 500 ſtadia from Babylon, famous for a battle fought there between Artaxerxes and his brother Cyrus the younger, B. C. 401. The latter entered the field of battle with 113,000 men, and the former's forces amounted to 900,000 men. The valor and the retreat of the 10,000 Greeks, who were among the troops of Cyrus, are well known, and have been celebrated by the pen of Xenophon, who was preſent at the battle, and who had the principal care of the retreat. Plut. in Artax.—Cteſias.

CUPĀVO, a ſon of Cycnus, who aſſiſted Æneas againſt Turnus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 186.

CUPENTUS, a friend of Turnus, killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 539.

CUPIDO, a celebrated deity among the ancients, god of love, and love itſelf. There are different traditions concerning his parents. Cicero mentions three Cupids; one, ſon of Mercury and Diana; another, ſon of Mercury and Venus; and the third, of Mars and Venus. Plato mentions two. Heſiod, the moſt ancient theogoniſt, ſpeaks only of one, who, as he ſays, was produced at the ſame time as Chaos and the Earth. There are, according to the more received opinions, two Cupids, one of whom is a lively ingenious youth, ſon of Jupiter and Venus; whilſt the other, ſon of Nox and Erebus, is diſtinguiſhed by his debauchery and riotous diſpoſition. Cupid is repreſented as a winged infant, naked, armed with a bow and a quiver full of arrows. On gems, and all other pieces of antiquity, he is repreſented as amuſing himſelf with ſome childiſh diverſion. Sometimes he appears driving a hoop, throwing a quoit, playing with a nymph, catching a butterfly, or trying to burn with a torch; at other times he plays upon a horn before his mother, or cloſely embraces a ſwan, or, with one foot raiſed in the air, he, in a muſing poſture, ſeems to meditate ſome trick. Sometimes, like a conqueror, he marches triumphantly with a helmet on his head, a ſpear on his ſhoulder, and a buckler on his arm, intimating, that even Mars himſelf owns the ſuperiority of love. His power was generally known by his riding on the back of a lion, or on a dolphin, or breaking to pieces the thunderbolts of Jupiter. Among the ancients he was worſhipped with the ſame ſolemnity as his mother Venus, and as his influence was extended over the heavens, the ſea, and the earth, and even the empire of the dead, his divinity was univerſally acknowledged, and vows prayers, and ſacrifices were daily offered to him. According to ſome accounts, the union of Cupid with Chaos gave birth to men, and all the animals which inhabit the earth, and even the gods themſelves were the offspring of love before the foundation of the world. Cupid, like the reſt of the gods, aſſumed different ſhapes; and we find him in the Æneid putting on, at the requeſt of his mother, the form of Aſcanius, and going to Dido's court, where he inſpired the queen with love. *Virg. CUPIENNIUS, a friend of Auguſtus, who made himſelf ridiculous for the nicety and effeminacy of his dreſs. Horat. 1, Sat. 2, v. 36.

CURES, a town of the Sabines, of which Tatius was king. The inhabitants, called Quirites, were carried to Rome, of which they became citizens. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 638.—Liv. 1. c. 13.

CURĒTES, a people of Crete, called alſo Corybantes, who, according to Ovid, were produced from rain. Their knowledge of all the arts was extenſive, and they communicated it to many parts of ancient Greece. They were entruſted with the education of Jupiter, and to prevent his being diſcovered by his father, they invented a kind of dance, and drowned his cries in the harſh ſounds of their ſhields and cymbals. Virg. G. 4, v. 151.—Strab.—Pauſ. 4, c. 33.

CURĒTIS, a name given to Crete, as being the reſidence of the Curetes, Ovid. Met. 8, v. 136.

CURIA, a diviſion of the Roman tribes. Romulus originally divided the people into three tribes, and each tribe into 10 Curiæ. Over each Curia was appointed a prieſt, who officiated at the ſacrifices of his reſpective aſſembly. The ſacrifices were called Curionia, and the prieſt Curio. He was to be above the age of fifty. His morals were to be pure and unexceptionable, and his body free from all defects. The Curiones were elected by their reſpective Curiæ, and above them was a ſuperior prieſt called Curio maximus, choſen by all the Curiæ in a public aſſembly.——The word Curia was alſo applied to public edifices among the Romans. Theſe were generally of two ſorts, divine and civil. In the former were held the aſſemblies of the prieſts, and of every religious order, for the regulation of religious religious ſacrifices and ceremonies. The other was appointed for the ſenate, where they aſſembled for the diſpatch of public buſineſs. The Curia was ſolemnly conſecrated by the Augurs, before a lawful aſſembly could be convened there. There were three at Rome which more particularly claim our attention; Curia Hoſtilia, built by king Tullus Hoſtilius; Curia Pompeii, where Julius Cæſar was murdered; and Curia Auguſti, the palace and court of the emperor Auguſtus.

Curiatii, a family of Alba, which was carried to Rome by Tullus Hoſtilius, and entered among the Patricians. The three Curiatii, who engaged the Horatii, and loſt the victory, were of this family, Flor. 1, c. 3.—Dionyſ. Hal. 3.—Liv. 1, c. 24.

Curia lex, de Comitiis, was enacted by M. Curius Dentatus the tribune. It forbade the convening of the Comitia, for the election of magiſtrates, without a previous permiſſion from the ſenate.

Q. Curio, an excellent orator, who called Cæſar in full ſenate, Omnium mulierum virum, et omnium virorum mulierum. Tacit. 11. ann. c. 7.—Suet. in Cæſ. 49.—Cic. in Brut.——His ſon, C. Scribonius, was tribune of the people, and an intimate friend of Cæſar. He ſaved Cæſar's life as he returned from the ſenate-houſe, after the debates concerning the puniſhments which ought to be inflicted on the adherents of Cataline. He killed himſelf in Africa. Flor. 4, c. 2.—Plut. in Pomp. & Cæſ. 49.—Val. Max. 9, c. 1.—Lucan. v. 268.

Curioſolitæ, a people among the Celtæ. Cæſ. bell. G. 3, c. 11.

Curium, a town of Cyprus. Herodot. 5, c. 113.

Curius Dentatus Marcus Annius, a Roman, celebrated for his fortitude and frugality. He was three times conſul, and was twice honored with a triumph. He obtained deciſive victories over the Samnites, the Sabines, and the Lucanians, and defeated Pyrrhus near Tarentum. The ambaſſadors of the Samnites viſited his cottage, while he was boiling ſome vegetables in an earthen pot, and they attempted to bribe him by the offer of large preſents. He refuſed their offers with contempt, and ſaid, I prefer my earthen pots to all your veſſels of gold and ſilver, and it is my wiſh to command thoſe who are in poſſeſſion of money, while I am deprived of it, and live in poverty. Plut. in Cat. Cenſ.—Horat. 1, od. 12, v. 41.—Flor. 1, c. 15.——A lieutenant of Cæſar's cavalry, to whom ſix cohorts of Pompey revolted, &c. Cæſ. 1 bell. Civ. 24.

Curtia, a patrician family, which migrated with Tatius to Rome.

Curtillus, a celebrated epicure, &c. Horat. 2, Sat. 8, v. 52.

M. Curtius, a Roman youth who devoted himſelf to the gods Manes for the ſafety of his country, about 360 years B. C. A wide gap had ſuddenly opened in the forum, and the oracle had ſaid that it never would cloſe before Rome threw into it whatever it had moſt precious. Curtius immediately perceived that no leſs than a human ſacrifice was required. He armed himſelf, mounted his horſe, and ſolemnly threw himſelf into the gulf, which inſtantly cloſed over his head. Liv. 7, c. 6.—Val. Max. 5, c, 6.——Q. Rufus. Vid. Quintus.——A grammarian intimate with Pompey, &c. Suet. de Gr.——Montanus, an orator and poet under Veſpaſian. Tacit. 4 Ann.

Curūlis Magiſtratus, a ſtate officer at Rome, who had the privilege of ſitting in an ivory chair in public aſſemblies. The dictator, the conſuls, the cenſors, the prætors, and ediles claimed that privilege, and therefore were called curules magiſtratus. The ſenators who had paſſed through the above-mentioned offices were generally carried to the ſenate-houſe in ivory chairs, as all generals in their triumphant proceſſion to the capitol. When names of diſtinction began to be known among the Romans, the deſcendants of curule magiſtrates were called nobles, the firſt of a family who diſcharged that office were known by the name of noti, and thoſe that had never been in office were called ignobiles.

Cutilium, a town of the Sabines. Liv. 26, c. 11.

Cyamoſōrus, a river of Sicily.

Cyăne, a nymph of Syracuſe, to whom her father offered violence in a fit of drunkenneſs. She dragged her raviſher to the altar, where ſhe ſacrificed him, and killed herſelf to ſtop a peſtilence, which, from that circumſtance had already begun to afflict the country. Plut. in Parall.——A nymph of Sicily, who endeavoured to aſſiſt Proſerpine when ſhe was carried away by Pluto. The god changed her into a fountain. Ovid. 5 Met. v. 112.——A town of Lycia. Plin. 5, c. 27.——An innkeeper, &c. Juv. 8, v. 162.

Cyăneæ, two rugged iſlands at the entrance of the Euxine ſea. One of them is on the ſide of Aſia, and the other on the European coaſt, and, according to Strabo, there is only a ſpace of 20 furlongs between them. The waves of the ſea, which continually break againſt them with a violent noiſe, fill the air with a darkening foam, and render the paſſage extremely dangerous.

The ancients ſuppoſed that theſe iſlands floated, and even ſometimes united to cruſh veſſels into pieces when they paſſed through the ſtraits. This tradition aroſe from their appearing, like all other objects, to draw nearer when you approached them. They were ſometimes called Symplegades and Planetæ. Their true ſituation and form was firſt explored and aſcertained by the Argonauts. Plin. 6, c. 12.—Herodot. 4, c. 85.—Apollon. 2.

CYANEE & CYANEA, a daughter of the Mæander, mother of Byblis and Caunus, by Miletus, Apollo's ſon. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 451.

CYANEUS, a large river of Colchis.

CYANIPPE, a daughter of Adraſtus.

CYANIPPUS, a Syracuſan, who derided the orgies of Bacchus, for which impiety the god ſo inebriated him, that he offered violence to his daughter Cyane, who ſacrificed him on the altar. Plut. in Parall.——A Theſſalian, whoſe wife met with the ſame fate as Procris. Plut. in Parall.

CYARAXES, or CYAXARES, ſon of Phraortes, was king of Media and Perſia. He bravely defended his kingdom, which the Scythians had invaded. He made war againſt Alyattes, king of Lydia, and ſubjected to his power all Aſia beyond the river Halys. He died after a reign of 40 years, B. C. 585. Diod. 2,—Herodot. 1, c. 73 & 103 ——Another prince, ſuppoſed by ſome to be the ſame as Darius the Mede. He was ſon of Aſtyages, king of Media. He added ſeven provinces to his father's dominions, and made war againſt the Aſſyrians, whom Cyrus favored. Xen. Cyrop. 1.

CYBEBE, a name of Cybele, from κυβηβειν, becauſe in the celebration of her feſtivals men were driven to madneſs.

CYBELE, a goddeſs, daughter of Cœlus and Terra, and wife of Saturn. She is ſuppoſed to be the ſame as Ceres, Rhea, Ops, Veſta, Bona Mater, Magna Mater, Berecynthia, Dindymene, &c. According to Diodorus, ſhe was the daughter of a Lydian prince; and as ſoon as ſhe was born ſhe was expoſed on a mountain. She was preſerved and ſuckled by ſome of the wild beaſts of the foreſt, and received the name of Cybele from the mountain where her life had been preſerved. When ſhe returned to her father's court, ſhe had an intrigue with Atys, a beautiful youth, whom her father mutilated, &c. All the mythologiſts are unanimous in mentioning the amours of Atys and Cybele. The partiality of the goddeſs for Atys ſeems to ariſe from his having firſt introduced her worſhip in Phrygia. She enjoined him perpetual celibacy, and the violation of his promiſe was expiated by voluntary mutilation. In Phrygia the feſtivals of Cybele were obſerved with the greateſt ſolemnity. Her prieſts, called Corybantes, Galli, &c. were not admitted in the ſervice of the goddeſs without a previous mutilation. In the celebration of the feſtivals, they imitated the manners of madmen, and filled the air with dreadful ſhrieks and howlings, mixed with the confuſed noiſe of drums, tabrets, bucklers and ſpears. This was in commemoration of the ſorrow of Cybele for the loſs of her favorite Atys. Cybele was generally repreſented as a robuſt woman, far advanced in her pregnancy, to intimate the fecundity of the earth. She held keys in her hand, and her head was crowned with riſing turrets, and ſometimes with the leaves of an oak. She ſometimes appears riding in a chariot drawn by two tame lions; Atys follows by her ſide, carrying a ball in his hand, and ſupporting himſelf upon a fir-tree, which is ſacred to the goddeſs. Sometimes Cybele is repreſented with a ſceptre in her hand, with her head covered with a tower. She is alſo ſeen with many breaſts, to ſhew that the earth gives aliments to all living creatures; and ſhe generally carries two lions under her arms. From Phrygia the worſhip of Cybele paſſed into Greece, and was ſolemnly eſtabliſhed at Eleuſis, under the name of the Eleuſinian myſteries of Ceres. The Romans, by order of the Sibylline books, brought the ſtatue of the goddeſs from Peſſinus into Italy; and when the ſhip which carried it had run on a ſhallow bank of the Tiber, the virtue and innocence of Claudia were vindicated in removing it with her girdle. It is ſuppoſed that the myſteries of Cybele were firſt known about 1580 years B. C. The Romans were particularly ſuperſtitious in waſhing every year, on the 6th of the calends of April, the ſhrine of this goddeſs, in the waters of the river Almon. There prevailed many obſcenities in the obſervation of the feſtivals, and the prieſts themſelves were the moſt eager to uſe indecent expreſſions, and to ſhew their unbounded licentiouſneſs by the impurity of their actions. *Vid. mis. After death he was honored as a god in Salamis and Attica. Plut. in Thes.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.

Cyclădes, a name given to certain islands of the Ægean sea, those particularly that surround Delos as with a circle; whence the name κυκλος, circulus. They were about 53 in number, the principal of which were Ceos, Naxos, Andros, Paros, Melos, Seriphos, Gyarus, Tenedos, &c. The Cyclades were reduced under the power of Athens by Miltiades; but during the invasion of Greece by the Persians, they revolted from their ancient and natural allies. *C. Cyclōpes, a certain race of men of gigantic stature, supposed to be the sons of Cœlus and Terra. They had but one eye in the middle of the forehead; whence their name, κυκλος circulus ωψ oculus. They were three in number, according to Hesiod, called Arges, Brontes, and Steropes. Their number was greater according to other mythologists, and in the age of Ulysses, Polyphemus was their king. [Vid. Polyphemus.] They inhabited the western parts of the island of Sicily; and because they were uncivilised in their manners, the poets speak of them as men-eaters. The tradition of their having only one eye, originates from their custom of wearing small bucklers of steel which covered their faces, and had a small aperture in the middle, which corresponded exactly to the eye. From their vicinity to mount Ætna, they have been supposed to be the workmen of Vulcan, and to have fabricated the thunderbolts of Jupiter. The most solid walls and impregnable fortresses were said, among the ancients, to be the work of the Cyclops, to render them more respectable, and we find that Jupiter was armed with what they had fabricated, and that the shield of Pluto, and the trident of Neptune, were the produce of their labor. The Cyclops were reckoned among the gods, and we find a temple dedicated to their service at Corinth, where sacrifices were solemnly offered. Apollo destroyed them all, because they had made the thunderbolts of Jupiter, with which his son Æsculapius had been killed. From the different accounts given of the Cyclops by the ancients, it may be concluded that they were all the same people, to whom various functions have been attributed, which cannot be reconciled one to the other, without drawing the pencil of fiction or mythology. Apollod. 1, c. 1 & 2.—*Homer. CYPRIĀNUS, a native of Carthage, who, though born of heathen parents, became a convert to chriſtianity, and the biſhop of his country. To be more devoted to purity and ſtudy, he abandoned his wife; and as proof of his charity he diſtributed his goods to the poor. He wrote 81 letters, beſides ſeveral treatiſes, de Dei gratiâ, de virginum habitu, &c. and rendered his compoſitions valuable by the information he conveys of the diſcipline of the ancient church, and by the ſoundneſs and purity of his theology. He died a martyr A. D. 258. The beſt editions of Cyprian are, that of Fell, fol. Oxon. 1682, and that reprinted Amſt. 1700.

CYPRUS, a daughter of Antony and Cleopatra, who married Agrippa.——A large iſland in the Mediterranean ſea, at the ſouth of Ciſicia, and at the weſt of Syria, formerly joined to the continent near Syria, according to Pliny. It has been anciently called Acamantis, Amathuſia, Aſpelia, Ceraſtis, Colonia or Colinia, Macaria, and Spechia. It has been celebrated for giving birth to Venus, who was the chief deity of the place, and to whoſe ſervice many places and temples were conſecrated. It was anciently divided into nine kingdoms, and was for ſome time under the power of Egypt, and afterwards of the Perſians. The Greeks made themſelves maſters of it, and it was taken from them by the Romans. Its length, according to Strabo, is 1400 ſtadia. There were three celebrated temples there, two ſacred to Venus, and the other to Jupiter. The inhabitants were given much to pleaſure and diſſipation. Strab. 15.—Flor. 3 c. 9.—Juſtin. 18, c. 5.—Plin. 12, c. 24.—Mela. 2, c. 7.

CYPSĔLIDES, the name of three princes as deſcendants of Cypſelus, who reigned at Corinth during 73 years. Cypſelus was ſucceeded by his ſon Periander, who left his kingdom, after a reign of 40 years, to Cypſelus II.

CYPSĔLUS, a king of Arcadia, who married the daughter of Cteſiphon, to ſtrengthen himſelf againſt the Heraclidæ Paus. 4. c. 3.——A man of Corinth, ſon of Eetion, and father of Periander. He deſtroyed the Bacchiadæ, and ſeized upon the ſovereign power, about 659 years before Chriſt. He reigned 30 years, and was ſucceeded by his ſon. Periander had two ſons. Lycophron, and Cypſelus who was inſane. Cypſelus received his name from the Greek word κυψελος a coffer, becauſe when the Bacchiadæ attempted to kill him, his mother ſaved his life by concealing him in a coffer. Paus. 5, c. 17.—*Cic. CYRRHUS & CYRUS, a river of Iberia, in Asia.

CYRSILUS, an Athenian, stoned to death for his ill advice to the state. Cic. 3, de offic. c. 11.

CYRUS, a king of Persia, son of Cambyses and Mandane, daughter of Astyages, king of Media. His father was of an ignoble family, whose marriage with Mandane had been consummated on account of the apprehensions of Astyages. (Vid. Astyages.) Cyrus was exposed as soon as born; but he was preserved by a shepherdess, who educated him as her own son. As he was playing with his equals in years, he was elected king in a certain diversion, and he exercised his power with such an independent spirit, that he ordered one of his play companions to be severely whipped for disobedience. The father of the youth, who was a nobleman, complained to the king of the ill-treatment which his son had received from a shepherd's son. Astyages ordered Cyrus before him, and discovered that he was Mandane's son, from whom he had so much to apprehend. He treated him with great coldness; and Cyrus, unable to bear his tyranny, escaped from his confinement, and began to levy troops to dethrone his grandfather. He was assisted and encouraged by the ministers of Astyages, who were displeased with the king's oppression. He marched against him, and Astyages was defeated in the battle, and taken prisoner, B. C. 559. From this victory the empire of Media became tributary to the Persians. Cyrus subdued the eastern parts of Asia, and made war against Crœsus, king of Lydia, whom he conquered, B. C. 548. He invaded the kingdom of Assyria, and took the city of Babylon, by drying the channels of the Euphrates, and marching his troops through the bed of the river, while the people were celebrating a grand festival. He afterwards marched against Tomyris, the queen of the Massagetæ, a Scythian nation, and was defeated in a bloody battle, B. C. 530. The victorious queen, who had lost her son in a previous battle, was so incensed against Cyrus, that she cut off his head, and threw it into a vessel filled with human blood, exclaiming, Satia te sanguine quem sitisti. Xenophon has written the life of Cyrus; but his history is not perfectly authentic. In the character of Cyrus, he delineates a brave and virtuous prince, and often puts in his mouth many of the sayings of Socrates. The chronology is false; and Xenophon, in his narration, has given existence to persons whom no other historian ever mentioned. The Cyropædia, therefore, is not to be looked upon as an authentic history of Cyrus the Great, but we must consider it as showing what every good and virtuous prince ought to be. Diod. 1.—Herodot. 1, c. 75, &c.—Justin. 1, c. 5, & 7.——The younger Cyrus, was the younger son of Darius Nothus, and the brother of Artaxerxes. He was sent by his father, at the age of sixteen, to assist the Lacedæmonians against Athens. Artaxerxes succeeded to the throne at the death of Nothus; and Cyrus, who was of an aspiring soul, attempted to assassinate him. He was discovered, and was to have been punished with death, had not his mother, Parysatis, saved him from the hands of the executioner by her tears and entreaties. This circumstance did not in the least check the ambition of Cyrus, he was appointed over Lydia and the sea-coasts, where he secretly fomented rebellion, and levied troops under various pretences. At last he took the field with an army of 100,000 barbarians, and 13,000 Greeks under the command of Clearchus. Artaxerxes met him with 900,000 men near Cunaxa. The battle was long and bloody, and Cyrus might have perhaps obtained the victory, had not his uncommon rashness proved his ruin. It is said that the two royal brothers met in person, and engaged with the most inveterate fury, and their engagement ended in the death of Cyrus, 401 years B. C. Artaxerxes was so anxious of its being universally reported that his brother had fallen by his hand, that he put to death two of his subjects, for boasting that they had killed Cyrus. The Greeks who were engaged in the expedition, obtained much glory in the battle; and after the death of Cyrus, they remained victorious in the field without a commander. They were not, however, discouraged, though at a great distance from their country, and surrounded on every side by a powerful enemy. They unanimously united in the election of commanders, and traversed all Asia, in spite of the continual attacks of the Persians; and nothing is more truly celebrated in ancient history than the bold retreat of the ten thousand. The journey that they made from the place of their first embarkation, till their return, has has been calculated at 1155 leagues, performed in the ſpace of 15 months, including all the time which was devoted to take reſt and refreſhment. This retreat has been celebrated by Xenophon, who was one of their leaders, and among the friends and ſupporters of Cyrus. It is ſaid, that in the letter he wrote to Lacedæmon, to ſolicit auxiliaries, Cyrus boaſted his philoſophy, his royal blood, and his ability to drink more wine than his brother, without being intoxicated. Plut. in Artax.—Diod. 14.—Juſtin. 5, c. 11.——A rival of Horace, in the affections of one of his miſtreſſes, 1. od. 17, v. 24.——A poet of Panopolis, in the age of Theodoſius.

CYRUS & CYROPŎLIS, a city of Syria.

CYRUS, a river of Perſia.

CYTŌRUS, a mountain and town of Galatia, built by Cytorus, ſon of Phryxus. Strab. 12.—Virg. G. 2, v. 437.

CYZĬCUM, an iſland of the Propontis, about 530 ſtadia in circumference, with a town called Cyzicus. Alexander joined it to the continent by two bridges, and from that time it was called a peninſula. It had two harbours called Panormus and Chytus, the firſt natural, and the other artificial. It became one of the moſt conſiderable cities of Aſia. It was beſieged by Mithridates, and relieved by Lucullus. Flor. 3, c. 5.—Plin. 5, c. 32.—Diod. 18.

CYZĬCUS, a ſon of Œneus and Stilbe, who reigned in Cyzicus. He hoſpitably received the Argonauts, in their expedition againſt Colchis. After their departure from the court of Cyzicus, they were driven back in the night, by a ſtorm upon the coaſt; and the inhabitants ſeeing ſuch an unexpected number of men, furiouſly attacked them, ſuppoſing them to be the Pelaſgi, their enemies. In this nocturnal engagement, many were killed on both ſides, and Cyzicus periſhed by the hand of Jaſon himſelf, who honored him with a ſplendid funeral, and raiſed a ſtately monument over his grave. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Flacc.—Apollon.—Orpheus.

CYZĬCUS, the chief town of the iſland of Cyzicum, built where the iſland is joined by the bridges to the continent. It has two excellent harbours called Panormus and Chytus. The former is naturally large and beautiful, and the other owes all its conveniences to the hand of art. The town is ſituate partly on a mountain, and partly in a plain. The Argonauts built a temple to Cybele, in the neighbourhood. It derives its name from Cyzicus, who was killed there by Jaſon. The Athenians defeated, near this place, their enemies of Lacedæmon, aſſiſted by Pharnabazus, B. C. 410, Flor. 3, c. 5, &c.—Strab.—Apollon. 1.—Propert. 3, el. 22.—Flacc. 2, v. 636.

DAÆ, DAHÆ or DAI, a people of Scythia, who dwelt on the borders of the Caſpian ſea. Virg. Æn. 1 v. 728.

DĀCI & DACÆ, a warlike nation of Germany, beyond the Danube, whoſe country, called Dacia, was conquered by the Romans under Trajan, after a war of 15 years, A. D. 103. Dacia is now the modern Moldavia. Lucan. 2, v. 53.

DACTŸLI, a name given to the prieſts of Cybele, which ſome derive from δακτυλος a finger, becauſe they were ten, the ſame number as the fingers of the hand. Pauſ. 1, c. 8.

DADICÆ, a people of Aſiatic Scythia. Herodot. 3, c. 91.

DÆDĂLA, a mountain and city of Lycia, where Dædalus was buried according to Pliny. 5, c. 27.——A name given to Circe, from her being cunning, (δαιδαλος,) and like Dædalus addicted to deceit and artifice. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 282.—Two feſtivals in Bœotia. One

One of these was observed at Alalcomenos by the Platæans, in a large grove, where they exposed in the open air, pieces of boiled flesh, and carefully observed whither the crows that came to prey upon them directed their flight. All the trees, upon which any of these birds alighted, were immediately cut down, and with them statues were made, called Dædala, in honor of Dædalus.——The other festival was of a more solemn kind. It was celebrated every sixty years, by all the cities of Bœotia, as a compensation for the intermission of the smaller festivals, for that number of years, during the exile of the Platæans. Fourteen of the statues, called Dædala, were distributed by lot among the Platæans, Lebadæans, Coroneans, Orchomenians, Thespians, Thebans, Tanagræans, and Chæroneans, because they had effected a reconciliation among the Platæans, and caused them to be recalled from exile, about the time that Thebes was restored by Cassander, the son of Antipater. During this festival, a woman in the habit of a bride-maid accompanied a statue, which was dressed in female garments, on the banks of the Eurotas. This procession was attended to the top of mount Cithæron, by many of the Bœotians, who had places assigned them by lot. Here an altar of square pieces of wood, cemented together like stones, was erected, and upon it were thrown large quantities of combustible materials. Afterwards a bull was sacrificed to Jupiter, and an ox or heifer to Juno, by every one of the cities of Bœotia, and by the most opulent that attended. The poorest citizens offered small cattle; and all these oblations, together with the Dædala, were thrown in the common heap and set on fire, and totally reduced to ashes. They originated in this: When Juno, after a quarrel with Jupiter, had retired to Eubœa, and refused to return to his bed, the god, anxious for her return, went to consult Cithæron king of Platæa, to find some effectual measure to break her obstinacy. Cithæron advised him to dress a statue in woman's apparel, and carry it in a chariot, and publicly to report it was Platæa, the daughter of Asopus, whom he was going to marry. The advice was followed, and Juno, informed of her husband's future marriage, repaired in haste to meet the chariot, and was easily united to him, when she discovered the artful measures he made use of to effect a reconciliation. Pausan. & Plut.

DÆDĂLION, a son of Lucifer, brother to Ceyx, and father of Philonis. He was so afflicted at the death of Philonis, whom Diana had put to death, that he threw himself down from the top of mount Parnassus, and was changed into a falcon by Apollo. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 295.

DÆDĂLUS, an Athenian, son of Eupalamus, descended from Erechtheus, king of Athens. He was the most ingenious artist of his age, and to him we are indebted for the invention of the wedge, and many other mechanical instruments, and the sails of ships. He made statues, which moved of themselves, and seemed to be endowed with life. Talus, his sister's son, promised to be as great as himself, by the ingenuity of his inventions; and therefore, from envy, he threw him down from a window and killed him. After the murder of this youth, Dædalus, with his son Icarus, fled from Athens to Crete, where Minos, king of the country, gave him a cordial reception. Dædalus made a famous labyrinth for Minos, and assisted Pasiphae, the queen, to gratify her unnatural passion for a bull. For this action, Dædalus incurred the displeasure of Minos, who ordered him to be confined in the labyrinth which he had constructed. Here he made himself wings with feathers and wax, and carefully fitted them to his body, and that of his son, who was the companion of his confinement. They took their flight in the air from Crete; but the heat of the sun melted the wax on the wings of Icarus, whose flight was too high, and he fell into that part of the ocean, which from him has been called the Icarian sea. The father, by a proper management of his wings, alighted at Cumæ, where he built a temple to Apollo, and thence directed his course to Sicily, where he was kindly received by Cocalus, who reigned over part of the country. He left many monuments of his ingenuity in Sicily, which still existed in the age of Diodorus Siculus. He was dispatched by Cocalus, who was afraid of the power of Minos, who had declared war against him, because he had given an asylum to Dædalus. The flight of Dædalus from Crete, with wings, is explained by observing that he was the inventor of sails, which in his age might pass at a distance for wings. Paus. 1, 7 & 9.—Diod. 4.—*Ovid. DÆMON, a kind of spirit which, as the ancients supposed, presided over the actions of mankind, gave them their private counsels, and carefully watched over their most secret intentions. Some of the ancient philosophers maintained that every man had two of these Dæmons; the one bad, and the other good. These Dæmons had the power of changing themselves into whatever they pleased, and of assuming whatever shapes were were moſt ſubſervient to their intentions. At the moment of death, the Dæmon delivered up to judgment, the perſon with whoſe care he had been entruſted; and according to the evidences he delivered, ſentence was paſſed over the body. The Dæmon of Socrates is famous in hiſtory. That great philoſopher aſſerted that the genius informed him when any of his friends was going to engage in ſome unfortunate enterprize, and ſtopped him from the commiſſion of all crimes and impiety. Theſe Genii or Dæmons, though at firſt reckoned only as the ſubordinate miniſters of the ſuperior deities, received divine honor in length of time, and we find altars and ſtatues erected to a Genio loci, Genio Auguſti, Junonibus, &c. *Cic. DANA, a large town of Cappadocia.

DANAE, the daughter of Acriſius king of Argos, by Eurydice. She was confined in a brazen tower by her father, who had been told by an oracle, that his daughter's ſon would put him to death. His endeavours to prevent Danae from becoming a mother proved fruitleſs; and Jupiter, who was enamoured of her, introduced himſelf to her bed, by changing himſelf into a golden ſhower. From his embraces Danae had a ſon, with whom ſhe was expoſed on the ſea by her father. The wind drove the bark which carried her, to the coaſts of the iſland of Seriphus, where ſhe was ſaved by ſome fiſhermen, and carried to Polydectes king of the place, whoſe brother, called Dictys, educated the child called Perſeus, and tenderly treated the mother. Polydectes fell in love with her; but as he was afraid of her ſon, he ſent him to conquer the Gorgons, pretending that he wiſhed Meduſa's head to adorn the nuptials which he was going to celebrate with Hippodamia, the daughter of Œnomaus. When Perſeus had victoriouſly finiſhed his expedition, he retired to Argos with Danae, to the houſe of Acriſius, whom he inadvertently killed. Some ſuppoſe that it was Prœtus the brother of Acriſius, who introduced himſelf to Danae in the brazen tower; and inſtead of a golden ſhower, it was maintained, that the keepers of Danae were bribed by the gold of her ſeducer. Virgil mentions that Danae came to Italy with ſome fugitives of Argos, and that ſhe founded a city called Ardea. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 611.—*Art. DANAI, a name given to the people of Argos, and promiſcuouſly to all the Greeks, from Danaus their king.

DANAIDES, the fifty daughters of Danaus king of Argos. When their uncle Ægyptus came from Egypt with his fifty ſons, they were promiſed in marriage to their couſins; and before the celebration of their nuptials, Danaus, who had been informed by an oracle that he was to be killed by the hands of one of his ſons-in-law, made his daughters ſolemnly promiſe that they would deſtroy their huſbands. They were provided with daggers by their father, and all except Hypermneſtra, ſtained their hands with the blood of their couſins, the firſt night of their nuptials; and, as a pledge of their obedience to their father's injunctions, they preſented him each with the head of the murdered ſons of Ægyptus. Hypermneſtra was ſummoned to appear before her father, and anſwer for her diſobedience in ſuffering her huſband, Lynceus, to eſcape; but the unanimous voice of the people declared her innocent, and ſhe dedicated a temple to the goddeſs of Perſuaſion. The ſiſters were purified of this murder by Mercury and Minerva, by order of Jupiter; but according to the more received opinion, they were condemned to ſevere puniſhment in hell, and were compelled to fill with water, a veſſel full of holes, ſo that the water ran out as ſoon as poured into it, and therefore their labor was infinite, and their puniſhment eternal. The names of the Danaides and their huſbands, were as follows, according to Apollodorus: Amymone married Enceladus; Automate, Buſiris; Agave, Lycus; Scea, Dayphron; Hippodamia, Iſter; Rhodia, Chalcedon; Calyce, another Lynceus; Gorgophone, Proteus; Cleopatra, Agenor; Aſteria, Chætus; Glauce, Aleis; Hippodamia, Diacorytes; Hippomeduſa, Alcmenon; Gorge, Hippothous; Iphimeduſa, Euchenor; Rhode, Hippolitus; Pirea, Agoptolemus; Cerceſis, Dorion; Pharte, Eurydamas; Mneſtra, Ægius; Evippe, Arigius; Anaxibia Archelaus; Nelo, Melachus; Clite, Clitus; Stenele, Stenelus; Chryſippe, Chryſippus; Antonoe, Eurylochus; Theane, Phantes; Electra, Periſtenes; Eurydice, Dryas; Glaucippe, Potamon; Autholea, Ciſſeus; Cleodora, Lixus; Evippe, Imbrus; Erata, Bromius; Stygne, Polyctor; Bryce, Chtonius; Actea, Periphas; Podarce, Œneus; Dioxippe, Ægyptus; Adyte, Menalces; Ocipete, Lampus; Pilarge, Idmon; Hippodice, Idas; Adiante, Daiphron; Callidia, Pandion; Œme, Arbelus; Celena, Hixbius; Hyperia, Hippocoriſtes. The heads of the ſons of Ægyptus were buried at Argos; but their bodies were left at Lerna, where the murder had been committed. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Horat. 3, od. 11.—Strab. 8.—Pauſ. 2, c. 16.—Hygin. fab. 168, &c.

DANĂLA, a caſtle of Galatia.

DĂNAUS, a ſon of Belus and Anchinoe, who, after his father's death, reigned conjointly with his brother Ægyptus on the throne of Egypt. Some time after, a difference aroſe between the brothers, and Danaus ſet ſail with his fifty daughters in queſt of a ſettlement. He viſited Rhodes, where he conſecrated a ſtatue to Minerva, and arrived ſafe on the coaſt of Peloponneſus, where he was hoſpitably received by Gelanor, king of Argos. Gelanor had lately aſcended the throne, and the firſt years of his reign were marked with diſſenſions with his ſubjects. Danaus took advantage of Gelanor's unpopularity, and obliged him to leave the crown. In Gelanor, the race of the Inachidæ was extinguiſhed, and the Belides began to reign at Argos in Danaus. Some authors ſay, that Gelanor voluntarily reſigned the crown to Danaus, on account of the wrath of Neptune, who had dried up all the waters of Argolis, to puniſh the impiety of Inachus. The ſucceſs of Danaus, invited the fifty ſons of Ægyptus to embark for Greece. They were kindly received by their uncle, who, either apprehenſive of their number, or terrified by an oracle which threatened his ruin by one of his ſons-in-law, cauſed his daughters, to whom they were promiſed in marriage, to murder them the firſt night of their nuptials. His orders were executed, Hypermneſtra alone ſpared the life of Lynceus. (Vid. Danaides.) Danaus, at firſt, perſecuted Lynceus with unremitted fury, but he was afterwards reconciled to him, and he acknowledged him for his ſon-in-law, and ſucceſſor, after a reign of 50 years. He died about 1425 years before the Chriſtian era, and after death, he was honored with a ſplendid monument in the town of Argos, which ſtill exiſted in the age of Pauſanias. According to Æſchylus, Danaus left Egypt, not to be preſent at the marriage of his daughters, with the ſons of his brother, a connection which he deemed unlawful and impious. The ſhip in which Danaus came to Greece, was called Armais, and was the firſt that had ever appeared there. It is ſaid that the uſe of pumps was firſt introduced into Greece by Danaus. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Pauſ. 2, c. 19.—Hygin. fab. 168, &c.—Herodot. 2, c. 91, &c. 7, c. 94.

DĂNŬBIUS, a celebrated river, the greateſt in Europe, which riſes, according to Herodotus, near the town of Pyrene, in the country of the Celtæ, and after flowing through the greateſt part of Europe, falls into the Euxine ſea. The Greeks called it Iſter; but the Romans diſtinguiſhed it by the appellation of the Danube, from its ſource till the middle of its courſe, and from thence to its mouths, they called it Iſter, like the Greeks. It falls into the Euxine through ſeven mouths, or ſix according to others. Herodotus mentions five, and modern travellers diſcover only two. The Danube was generally ſuppoſed to be the northern boundary of the Roman empire in Europe; and therefore, leve al caſtles were erected on its banks, to check the incurſions of the barbarians. It was worſhipped as a deity by the Scythians. Dionyſ. Perieg.—Herodot. 2, c. 33, l. 4, c. 48. &c.—Strab. 4.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Ammian 23.

Daphne, a daughter of the river Peneus, or of the Ladon, by the goddeſs Terra, of whom Apollo became enamoured. This paſſion had been raiſed by Cupid, with whom Apollo, proud of his late conqueſt over the ſerpent Python, had diſputed the power of his darts. Daphne heard with horror the addreſſes of the god, and endeavoured to remove herſelf from his importunities by flight. Apollo purſued her; and Daphne, fearful of being caught, intreated the aſſiſtance of the gods, who changed her into a laurel. Apollo crowned his head with the leaves of the laurel, and for ever ordered that that tree ſhould be ſacred to his divinity. Some ſay that Daphne was admired by Leucippus, ſon of Œnomaus king of Piſa, who, to be in her company, diſguiſed his ſex, and attended her in the woods, in the habit of a huntreſs. Leucippus gained Daphne's eſteem and love; but Apollo, who was his powerful rival, diſcovered his ſex, and Leucippus was killed by the companions of Dians. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 452, &c.—Parthen. Erotic. c. 15.——A daughter of Tireſias, prieſteſs in the temple of Delphi. She was conſecrated to the ſervice of Apollo by the Epigoni, or according to others, by the goddeſs Tellus. She was called Sibyl, on account of the wildneſs of her looks and expreſſions, when ſhe delivered oracles. Her oracles were generally in verſe, and Homer, according to ſome accounts, has introduced much of her poetry in his compoſitions. Diod. 4.—Pauſ. 10, c. 5.——A grove near Antioch.

Daphnephoria, a feſtival in honor of Apollo, celebrated every ninth year by the Bœotians. It was then uſual to adorn an olive bough with garlands of laurel and other flowers, and place on the top a brazen globe, on which were ſuſpended ſmaller ones. In the middle was placed a number of crowns, and a globe of inferior ſize, and the bottom was adorned with a ſaffron colored garment. The globe on the top repreſented the Sun, or Apollo; that in the middle was an emblem of the moon, and the others of the ſtars. The crowns, which were 65 in number, repreſented the ſun's annual revolutions. This bough was carried in ſolemn proceſſion by a beautiful youth of an illuſtrious family, and whoſe parents were both living. The youth was dreſſed in rich garments which reached to the ground, his hair hung looſe and diſheveled, his head was covered with a golden crown, and he wore on his feet ſhoes called Iphicratidæ, from Iphicrates an Athenian, who firſt invented them. He was called Δαφνηφορος, laurel-bearer, and at that time he executed the office of prieſt of Apollo. He was preceded by one of his neareſt relations, bearing a rod adorned with garlands, and behind him followed a train of virgins with branches in their hands. In this order the proceſſion advanced as far as the temple of Apollo, ſirnamed Iſmenius, where ſupplicatory hymns were ſung to the god.—This feſtival owes its origin to the following circumſtances: when an oracle adviſed the Ætolians, who inhabited Arne and the adjacent country, to abandon their antient poſſeſſions, and go in queſt of a ſettlement, they invaded the Theban territories, which at that time were pillaged by an army of Pelaſgians. As the celebration of Apollo's feſtivals was near, both nations, who religiouſly obſerved it, laid aſide all hoſtilities, and, according to cuſtom, cut down laurel boughs from mount Helicon, and in the neighbourhood of the river Melas, and walked in proceſſion in honor of the divinity. The day that this ſolemnity was obſerved, Polemates, the general of the Bœotian army, ſaw a youth in a dream that preſented him with a complete ſuit of armour, and commanded the Bœotians to offer ſolemn prayers to Apollo, and walk in proceſſion with laurel boughs in their hands every ninth year. Three days after this dream, the Bœotian general made a ſally, and cut off the greateſt part of the beſiegers, who were compelled by this blow to relinquiſh their enterpriſe. Polemates immediately inſtituted a novennial feſtival to the god, who ſeemed to be the patron of the Bœotians. Pauſ. Bœotic, &c.

Daphnis, a ſhepherd of Sicily, ſon of Mercury by a Sicilian nymph. He was educated by the nymphs. Pan taught him to ſing and play upon the pipe, and the muſes inſpired him with the love of poetry. It is ſuppoſed he was the firſt who wrote paſtoral poetry, in which his ſucceſſor Theocritus ſo happily excelled. He was extremely fond of hunting; and at his death; five of his dogs, from their attachment to him, refuſed all aliments, and pined away. *Ælian V. DARDĀNUS, a son of Jupiter and Electra, who killed his brother Jasius to obtain the kingdom of Etruria after the death of his reputed father Corytus, and fled to Samothrace, and thence to Asia Minor, where he married Batia, the daughter of Teucer, king of Teucria. After the death of his father-in-law he ascended the throne, and reigned 62 years. He built the city of Dardania, and was reckoned the founder of the kingdom of Troy. He was succeeded by Erichthonius. According to some, Corybas, his nephew, accompanied him to Teucria, where he introduced the worship of Cybele. Dardanus taught his subjects to worship Minerva; and he gave them two statues of the goddess, one of which is well known by the name of Palladium. *Virg. DARIAVES, the name of Darius in Persian. Strab. 16.

DARITÆ, a people of Persia. Herodot. 3, c. 92.

DARIUS, a noble satrap of Persia, son of Hystaspes, who conspired with six other noblemen to destroy Smerdis, who usurped the crown of Persia after the death of Cambyses. On the murder of the usurper, the seven conspirators universally agreed, that he whose horse neighed first should be appointed king. The groom of Darius previously led his master's horse to a mare, at a place near which the seven noblemen were to pass. On the morrow before sun-rise, when they proceeded all together, the horse recollecting the mare, suddenly neighed; and at the same time a clap of thunder was heard, as if in approbation of the choice. The noblemen dismounted from their horses, and saluted Darius king; and a resolution was made among them, that the king's wives and concubines should be taken from no other family but that of the conspirators, and that they should for ever enjoy the unlimited privilege of being admitted into the king's presence without previous introduction. Darius was 29 years old when he ascended the throne, and he soon distinguished himself by his activity and military accomplishments. He besieged Babylon; which he took, after a siege of 20 months, by the artifice of Zopyrus. From thence he marched against the Scythians, and in his way conquered Thrace. This expedition was unsuccessful; and the king, after several losses and disasters in the wilds of Scythia, retired with shame, and turned his arms against the Indians, whom he subdued. The burning of Sardis, which was a Grecian colony, incensed the Athenians, and a war was kindled between Greece and Persia. Darius was so exasperated against the Greeks, that a servant every evening, by his order, repeated these words: "Remember, O king, to punish the Athenians." Mardonius, the king's son-in-law, was entrusted with the care of the war, but his army was destroyed by the Thracians; and Darius, more animated by his loss, sent a more considerable force, under the command of Datis and Artaphernes. They were conquered at the celebrated battle of Marathon, by 10,000 Athenians; and the Persians lost in that expedition no less than 206,000 men. Darius was not disheartened by this severe blow, but he resolved to carry on the war in person, and immediately ordered a still larger army to be levied. He died in the midst of his preparations, B. C. 485, after a reign of 36 years, in the 65th year of his age. Herodot. 1, 2, &c.—Diod. 1.—Justin. 1, c. 9.—Plut. in Arist.—C. Nep. in Miltiad.——The second king of Persia of that name, was also called Ochus, or Nothus, because he was the illegitimate son of Artaxerxes by a concubine. Soon after the murder of Xerxes he ascended the throne of Persia, and married Paryatis his sister, a cruel and ambitious woman, by whom he had Artaxerxes Memnon, Ameistris, and Cyrus the younger. He carried on many wars with success, under the conduct of his generals and of his son Cyrus. He died B. C. 404, after a reign of 19 years, and was succeeded by his son Artaxerxes, who asked him on his death bed, what had been the guide of his conduct in the management of the empire that he might imitate him? The dictates of justice and of religion, replied the expiring monarch. Justin. 5, c. 11.—Diod. 12.——The third of that name was the last king of Persia, surnamed named Codomanus. He was son of Arsanes and Sysigambis, and descended from Darius Nothus. The eunuch Bagoas raised him to the throne, though not nearly allied to the royal family, in hopes that he would be subservient to his will; but he prepared to poison him, when he saw him despise his advice, and aim at independence. Darius discovered his perfidy, and made him drink the poison which he had prepared against his life. The peace of Darius was early disturbed, and Alexander invaded Persia to avenge the injuries which the Greeks had suffered from the predecessors of Darius. The king of Persia met his adversary in person, at the head of 600,000 men. This army was remarkable, more for its opulence and luxury, than for the military courage of its soldiers; and Athenæus mentions, that the camp of Darius was crowded with 277 cooks, 29 waiters, 37 cup-bearers, 40 servants to perfume the king, and 66 to prepare garlands and flowers to deck the dishes and meats which appeared on the royal table. With these forces Darius met Alexander. A battle was fought near the Granicus, in which the Persians were easily defeated. Another was soon after fought near Issus; and Alexander left 110,000 of the enemy dead in the field of battle, and took among the prisoners of war, the mother, wife and children of Darius. The darkness of the night favored the retreat of Darius, and he saved himself by flying in disguise, on the horse of his armbearer. These losses weakened, but discouraged not Darius: he assembled another more powerful army, and the last decisive battle was fought at Arbela. The victory was long doubtful; but the intrepidity of Alexander, and the superior valor of the Macedonians, prevailed over the effeminate Persians; and Darius, sensible of his disgrace and ruin, fled towards Media. His misfortunes were now increased. Bessus, the governor of Bactriana, took away his life, in hopes of succeeding him on the throne; and Darius was found by the Macedonians in his chariot, covered with wounds, and almost expiring, B. C. 331. He asked for water, and exclaimed, when he received it from the hand of a Macedonian, "It is the greatest of my misfortunes that I cannot reward thy humanity. Beg Alexander to accept my warmest thanks, for the tenderness with which he has treated my wretched family, whilst I am doomed to perish by the hand of a man, whom I have loaded with kindness." These words of the dying monarch, were reported to Alexander, who covered the dead body with his own mantle, and honored it with a most magnificent funeral. The traitor Bessus, met with a due punishment from the conqueror, who continued his kindness to the unfortunate family of Darius. Darius has been accused of imprudence, for the imperious and arrogant manner in which he wrote his letters to Alexander, in the midst of his misfortunes. In him the empire of Persia was extinguished 228 years after it had been first founded by Cyrus the Great. Diod. 17.—Plut. in Alex. —Justin. 10, 11, &c.—Curtius.——A son of Xerxes, who married Artaynta, and was killed by Artabanus. Herodot. 9, c. 108.—Diod. 11.——A son of Artaxerxes declared successor to the throne, as being the eldest prince. DATĂMES, a son of Camissares, governor of Caria, and general of the armies of Artaxerxes. The influence of his enemies at court obliged him to fly for safety, after he had greatly signalized himself by his military exploits. He took up arms in his own defence, and the king made war against him. He was treacherously killed by Mithridates, who had invited him under pretence of entering into the most inviolable connection and friendship, 362 B. C. C. Nep. in Datam.

DATAPHERNES, one of the friends of Bessus. After the murder of Darius, he betrayed Bessus into Alexander's hands. He also revolted from the conqueror, and was delivered up by the Dahæ. Curt. 7, c. 5 & 8.

DATIS, a general of Darius 1st, sent with an army of 200,000 foot, and 10,000 horse, against the Greeks, in conjunction with Artaphernes. He was defeated at the celebrated battle of Marathon, by Miltiades, and some time after put to death by the Spartans. C. Nep. in Milt DATOS, or DATON, a town of Thrace, on a small eminence, near the Strymon. There is in the neighbourhood a fruitful plain, from which Proserpine, according to some, was carried away by Pluto. That city was so rich, that the antients generally made use of the word Datos, to express abundance. When the king of Macedonia conquered it, he called it Philippi, after his own name. Appian. de Civ.

DEBÆ, a nation of Arabia. Diod. 3.

DECEBĂLUS, a warlike king of the Daci, who made a successful war against Domitian. He was conquered by Trajan, Domitian's successor, and he obtained peace. His active spirit again kindled rebellion, and the Roman emperor marched against him, and defeated him. He destroyed himself, and his head was brought to Rome, and Dacia became a Roman province, A. D. 103.—Dio. 68.

DECELEUM, a small village of Attica, north of Athens; which, when in the hands of the Spartans, proved a very galling garrison to the Athenians. Some time the Peloponnesian war has been called Decelea, because for some time hostilities were carried on in its neighbourhood.

DECĔLUS, a man who informed Castor and Pollux, that their sister, whom Theseus had carried away, was concealed at Aphidnæ. Herodot. 9, c. 73.

DECEMVIRI, ten magistrates of absolute authority among the Romans. The privileges of the patricians raised dissatisfaction among the plebeians; who, though freed from the power of the Tarquins, still saw that the administration of justice depended upon the will and caprice of their superiors, without any written statute to direct them, and convince them that they were governed with equity and impartiality. The tribunes complained to the senate, and demanded that a code of laws might be framed for the use and benefit of the Roman people. This petition was complied with, and three ambassadors were sent to Athens, and all other Grecian states, to collect the laws of Solon, and of all the other celebrated legislators of Greece. Upon the return of the commissioners, it was universally agreed, that ten new magistrates, called Decemviri, should be elected from the senate, to put the project into execution. Their power was absolute; all other offices ceased after their election, and they presided over the city with regal authority. They were invested with the badges of the consul, in the enjoyment of which they succeeded by turns, and only one was preceded by the fasces, and had the power of assembling the senate, and confirming decrees. The first decemvirs were Appius Claudius, T. Genutius, P. Sextius, Sp. Veturius, C. Julius, A. Manlius, Ser. Sulpitius Pluriatius, T. Romulus, Sp. Posthumius, A. U. C. 303. Under them, the laws, which had been exposed to public view, that every citizen might speak his sentiments, were publicly approved of as constitutional, and ratified by the priests and augurs, in the most solemn and religious manner. They were ten in number, and were engraved on tables of brass; two were afterwards added, and they were called the laws of the twelve tables, leges duodecim tabularum, and leges decemvirales. The decemviral power, which was beheld by all ranks of people with the greatest satisfaction, was continued; but in the third year after their creation, the decemvirs became odious, on account of their tyranny; and the attempt of Ap. Claudius to ravish Virginia, totally abolished the office. The people were so exasperated against them, that they demanded them from the senate, to burn them alive. Consuls were again appointed, and tranquillity re-established in the state.——There were other officers in Rome, called decemvirs, who were originally appointed, in the absence of the prætor, to administer justice. Their appointment became afterwards necessary, and they generally assisted at sales called subhastationes, because a spear, hasta, was fixed at the door of the place where the goods were exposed to sale. They were called decemviri litibus judicandis. The officers whom Tarquin appointed to guard the Sybylline books, were also called decemviri. They were originally two in number, called duumviri, till the year of Rome 388, when their number was increased to ten, five of which were chosen from the plebeians, and five from the patricians. Sylla increased their number to fifteen, called quindecemvirs.

DECETIA, a town of Gaul. Cæs.

DECINEUS, a celebrated soothsayer. Strab. 16.

DECIUS MUS, a celebrated Roman consul, who, after many glorious exploits, devoted himſelf to the gods manes for the ſafety of his country, in a battle againſt the Latins, 338 years B. C. His ſon Decius imitated his example, and devoted himſelf in like manner in his fourth conſulſhip, when fighting againſt the Gauls and Samnites, B. C. 296. His grandſon alſo did the ſame in the war againſt Pyrrhus and the Tarentines. B. C. 280. This action of devoting oneſelf, was of infinite ſervice to the ſtate. The ſoldiers were animated by the example, and induced to follow with intrepidity, a commander who, arrayed in an unuſual dreſs, and addreſſing himſelf to the gods with ſolemn invocation, ruſhed into the thickeſt part of the enemy to meet his fate. Liv. 8, 9, &c.—Val. Max. 5, c. 6.—Polyb. 2.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 824.——Brutus, conducted Cæſar to the ſenate houſe the day that he was murdered.——(Cn. Metius, Q. Trajanus) a native of Pannonia, ſent by the emperor Philip, to appeaſe a ſedition in Mœſia. Inſtead of obeying his maſter's command, he aſſumed the imperial purple, and ſoon after marched againſt him, and at his death became the only emperor. He ſignalized himſelf againſt the Perſians; and when he marched againſt the Goths, he puſhed his horſe in a deep marſh, from which he could not extricate himſelf, and he periſhed with all his army by the darts of the barbarians, A. D. 251, after a reign of two years. This monarch enjoyed the character of a brave man, and of a great diſciplinarian; and by his juſtice and exemplary life, merited the title of Optimus, which a ſervile ſenate laviſhed upon him.

DECURIO, a ſubaltern officer in the Roman armies. He commanded a decuria, which conſiſted of ten men, and was the third part of a turma, or the 30th part of a legio of horſe, which was compoſed of 300 men. The badge of the Centurions was a vine rod or ſapling, and each had a deputy called optio. There were certain magiſtrates in the provinces, called decuriones municipales, who formed a body to repreſent the Roman ſenate in free and corporate towns. They conſiſted of ten, whence the name; and their duty extended to watch over the intereſts of their fellow-citizens, and to increaſe the revenues of the commonwealth. Their court was called curia decurionum, and minor ſenatus; and their decrees, called decreta decurionum, were marked with two D D. at the top. They generally ſtyled themſelves civitatum patres curiales, and honorati municipiorum ſenatores. They were elected with the ſame ceremonies as the Roman ſenators; they were to be at leaſt 25 years of age, and to be poſſeſſed of a certain ſum of money. The election happened on the calends of March.

DEJANIRA, a daughter of Œneus, king of Ætolia. Her beauty procured her many admirers, and her father promiſed to give her in marriage to him only who proved to be the ſtrongeſt of all his competitors. Hercules obtained the prize, and married Dejanira, by whom he had three children, the moſt known of whom is Hyllus. As Dejanira was once travelling with her huſband, they were ſtopped by the ſwollen ſtreams of the Evenus, and the centaur Neſſus offered Hercules to convey her ſafe to the oppoſite ſhore. The hero conſented; but no ſooner had Neſſus gained the bank, than he attempted to offer violence to Dejanira, and carry her away in the ſight of her huſband. Hercules, upon this, aimed, from the other ſhore, a poiſoned arrow at the ſeducer, and mortally wounded him. Neſſus, as he expired, wiſhed to avenge his death upon his murderer; and he gave Dejanira his tunic, which was covered with blood, poiſoned and infected by the arrow, obſerving, that it had the power of reclaiming a huſband from unlawful loves. Dejanira accepted the preſent; and when Hercules proved faithleſs to her bed, ſhe ſent him the centaur's tunic, which inſtantly cauſed his death, (Vid. Hercules.) Dejanira was ſo diſconſolate at the death of her huſband, which ſhe had ignorantly occaſioned, that ſhe deſtroyed herſelf. *Ovid. DEIMACHUS, a ſon of Neleus and Chloris, killed by Hercules. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—The father of Enarette. Id. 1, c. 7.

DEIOCES, a ſon of Phraortes, by whoſe means the Medes delivered themſelves from the yoke of the Aſſyrians. He preſided as judge among his countrymen, and his great popularity popularity and love of equity raiſed him to the throne, and he made himſelf abſolute. B. C. 700. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Phraortes, after a reign of 53 years. He built Ecbatana according to Herodotus, and ſurrounded it with ſeven different walls, in the middle of which was the royal palace, Herodot. 1, c. 96. &c.—Polyæn.

DEĬŎCHUS, a Greek captain, killed by Paris in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 15, v. 341.

DEĬŎNE, the mother of Miletus by Apollo. Miletus is often called Deionides, on account of his mother. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 442

DEĬŎNEUS, a king of Phocis, who married Diomede, daughter of Xuthus, by whom he had Dia. He gave his daughter Dia in marriage to Ixion, who promiſed to make a preſent to his father-in-law. Deioneus accordingly viſited the houſe of Ixion, and was thrown into a large hole filled with burning coals, by his ſon-in-law. Hygin. fab. 48 & 241.—Apollod. 1, c. 7 & 9, l. 2, c. 4.

DEĬŎPĒIA, a nymph, the faireſt of all the fourteen nymphs that attended upon Juno. The goddeſs promiſed her in marriage to Æolus the god of the winds, if he would deſtroy the fleet of Æneas, which was ſailing for Italy. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 76. ——One of the attendant nymphs of Cyrene. Virg. G. 4, v. 343.

DEIOTĂRUS, a governor of Galatia, made king of that province by the Roman people. In the civil wars of Pompey and Cæſar, Deiotarus followed the intereſt of the former. After the battle of Pharſalia. Cæſar ſeverely reprimanded Deiotarus for his attachment to Pompey, deprived him of part of his kingdom, and left him only the bare title of royalty. When he was accuſed by his grandſon, of attempts upon Cæſar's life, Cicero ably defended him in the Roman ſenate. He joined Brutus with a large army, and faithfully ſupported the republican cauſe. His wife was barren; but fearing that her huſband might die without iſſue, ſhe preſented him with a beautiful ſlave, and tenderly educated, as her own, the children of this union. Deiotarus died in an advanced old age. Strab. 12.——Lucan. 5, v. 55.

DEĬPHŎBE, a ſibyl of Cumæ, daughter of Glaucus. It is ſuppoſed that ſhe led Æneas to the infernal regions. (Vid. Sibyllæ.)—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 36.

DEĬPHŎBUS, a ſon of Priam and Hecuba, who, after the death of his brother Paris, married Helen. His wife unworthily betrayed him, and introduced into his chamber her old huſband Menelaus, to whom ſhe wiſhed to reconcile herſelf. He was ſhamefully mutilated and killed by Menelaus. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 495.—Homer. Il. 13.——A ſon of Hippolytus, who purified Hercules after the murder of Iphitus. Apollod. 2, c. 6.

DEĬPHON, a brother of Triptolemus, ſon of Celeus and Metanira. When Ceres travelled over the world, ſhe ſtopped at his father's court, and undertook to nurſe him and bring him up. To reward the hoſpitality of Celeus, the goddeſs began to make his ſon immortal; and every evening ſhe placed him on burning coals, to purify him from whatever mortal particles he ſtill poſſeſſed. The uncommon growth of Deiphon aſtoniſhed Metanira, who wiſhed to ſee what Ceres did to make him ſo vigorous. She was frightened to ſee her ſon on burning coals, and the ſhrieks that ſhe uttered, diſturbed the myſterious operations of the goddeſs, and Deiphon periſhed in the flames. Apollod. 1, c. 5.——The huſband of Hyrnetho, daughter of Temenus, king of Argos. Id. 2, c. 7.

DEĬPŸRUS, a Grecian chief, during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 8.

DELDON, a king of Myſia, defeated by Craſſus.

DĒLIA, a feſtival celebrated every fifth year in the iſland of Delos, in honor of Apollo. It was firſt inſtituted by Theſeus, who, at his return from Crete, placed a ſtatue there, which he had received from Ariadne. At the celebration, they crowned the ſtatue of the goddeſs with garlands, appointed a choir of muſic, and exhibited horſe races They afterwards led a dance, in which they imitated, by their motions, the various windings of the Cretan labyrinth, from which Theſeus had extricated himſelf by Ariadne's aſſiſtance.——There was alſo another feſtival of the ſame name, yearly celebrated by the Athenians in Delos. It was alſo inſtituted by Theſeus, who, when he was going to Crete, made a vow, that if he returned victorious, he would yearly viſit, in a ſolemn manner, the temple of Delos. The perſons employed in this annual proceſſion, were called Deliaſtæ and Theori. The ſhip, the ſame which carried Theſeus, and had been carefully preſerved by the Athenians, was called Theoria and Delias. When the ſhip was ready for the voyage, the prieſt of Apollo ſolemnly adorned the ſtern with garlands, and an univerſal luſtration was made all over the city. The Thesei were crowned with laurels, and before them proceeded men armed with axes, in commemoration of Theseus, who had cleared the way from Trœzene to Athens, and delivered the country from robbers. When the ship arrived at Delos, they offered solemn sacrifices to the god of the island, and celebrated a festival in his honor. After this, they retired to their ship, and sailed back to Athens, where all the people of the city ran in crowds to meet them. Every appearance of festivity prevailed at their approach, and the citizens opened their doors, and prostrated themselves before the Deliastæ, as they walked in procession. During this festival, it was unlawful to put to death any malefactor, and on that account the life of Socrates was prolonged for thirty days. Xenoph. Memor. & in Conv.—Plat. in Phæd.—Senec. ep. 70.

DĒLIUS, a surname of Apollo, because he was born in Delos.——Quint. an officer of Antony, who, when he was sent to cite Cleopatra before his master, advised her to make her appearance in the most captivating attire: the plan succeeded. He afterwards abandoned his friend, and fled to Augustus, who received him with great kindness. Horace has addressed, 2 od. 3. to him. Plut. in Anton.

DELMATIUS, Fl. Jul. a nephew of Constantine the great, honored with the title of Cæsar, and put in possession of Thrace, Macedonia and Achaia. His great virtues were unable to save him from a violent death, he was assassinated by his own soldiers, &c.

DĒLOS, one of the Cyclades at the north of Naxos, was severally called Lagia, Ortygia, Asteria, Chlamidia, Pelasgia, Pyrpyle, Cynthus, and Cynæthus, and now bears the name of Sailles. It was called Delos from δῆλος, because it suddenly made its appearance on the surface of the sea, by the power of Neptune, according to the mythologists, who permitted Latona to bring forth there, when she was persecuted all over the earth, and could find no safe asylum. (Vid. Apollo.) The island is celebrated for the nativity of Apollo and Diana; and the solemnity with which the festivals of these deities were celebrated there, by the inhabitants of the neighbouring islands, and of the continent, is well known. One of the altars of Apollo, in the island, was reckoned among the seven wonders of the world. It had been erected by Apollo when only four years old, and made with the horns of goats, killed by Diana on mount Cynthus. It was unlawful to sacrifice any living creature upon that altar, which was religiously kept pure from blood and every pollution. The whole island of Delos was held in such veneration, that the Persians, who had pillaged and profaned all the temples of Greece, never offered violence to the temple of Apollo, but looked upon it with the most awful reverence. Apollo, whose image was in the shape of a dragon, delivered there oracles during the summer, in a plain manner, without any ambiguity or obscure meaning. No dogs, as Thucydides mentions, were permitted to enter the island. It was unlawful for a man to die, or for a child to be born there; and when the Athenians were ordered to purify the place, they dug up all the dead bodies that had been interred there, and transported them to the neighbouring islands. An edict was also issued, which commanded all persons laboring under any mortal or dangerous disease, to be instantly removed to the adjacent island called Rhane. Some mythologists suppose that Asteria, who changed herself into a quail, to avoid the importuning addresses of Jupiter, was metamorphosed into this island, originally called Ortygia *ab ορτυξ, a quail. DELMĬNIUM, a town of Dalmatia. Flor. 4, c. 12.

DELPHI, a town of Phocis, situate in a valley at the south-west side of mount Parnassus. It was also called Pytho, because the serpent Python was killed there; and it received the name of Delphi, from Delphus, the son of Apollo. Some have also called it Parnassia Nape, the valley of Parnassus. It was famous for a temple of Apollo, and for an oracle celebrated in every age and country. The origin of the oracle, though fabulous, is described as something wonderful. A number of goats that were feeding on mount Parnassus, came near a place which had a deep and long perforation. The steam which issued from the hole, seemed to inspire the goats, and they played and frisked about in such an uncommon manner, that the goatherd was tempted to lean on the hole, and see what mysteries the place contained. He was immediately seized with a fit of enthusiasm, his expressions were wild and extravagant, and paſſed for prophecies. This circumſtance was ſoon known about the country, and many experienced the ſame enthuſiaſtic inſpiration. The place was revered, and a temple was ſoon after erected in honor of Apollo, and a city built. According to ſome accounts, Apollo was not the firſt who gave oracles there; but Terra, Neptune, Themis, and Phœbe, were in poſſeſſion of the place before the ſon of Latona. The oracles were generally given in verſe; but when it had been ſarcaſtically obſerved, that the god and patron of poetry was the moſt imperfect poet in the world, the prieſteſs delivered her anſwers in proſe. The oracles were always delivered by a prieſteſs called Pythia. (Vid. Pythia.) The temple was built and deſtroyed ſeveral times. It was cuſtomary for thoſe who conſulted the oracle, to make rich preſents to the god of Delphi; and no monarch diſtinguiſhed himſelf more by his donations than Crœſus. This ſacred repoſitory of opulence, was often the object of plunder; and Nero carried from it no leſs than 500 ſtatues of braſs, partly of the gods, and partly of the moſt illuſtrious heroes. And in another age, Conſtantine the Great removed its moſt ſplendid ornaments to his new capital. It was univerſally believed, and ſupported, by the antients, that Delphi was in the middle of the earth; and on that account it was called terræ umbilicus. This, according to mythology, was firſt found out by two doves, which Jupiter had let looſe from the two extremities of the earth, and which met at the place where the temple of Delphi was built. Apollon. 2, v. 706.—Diod. 16.—Plut. de defect. orac. &c.—Pauſ. 10, c. 6, &c.—*Ovid. DEMARĀTUS, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Ariſton on the throne of Sparta, B. C. 526. He was baniſhed by the intrigues of Cleomenes, his royal colleague, as being illegitimate. He retired into Aſia, and was kindly received by Darius ſon of Hyſtaſpes king of Perſia. When the Perſian monarch made preparations to invade Greece, Demaratus, though perſecuted by the Lacedæmonians, informed them of the hoſtilities which hung on their head. Herodot. 5, c. 75, &c. l. 6, c. 50, &c.——A rich citizen of Corinth, of the family of the Bacchiadæ. When Cypſelus had uſurped the ſovereign power of Corinth, Demaratus, with all his family, migrated to Italy, and ſettled at Tarquinii, 658 years before Chriſt. His ſon, Lucumon, was king of Rome, under the name of Tarquinius Priſcus. Dionyſ. Hal.——A Corinthian exile at the court of Philip king of Macedonia. Plut. in Alex.

DEMARCHUS, a Syracuſan, put to death by Dionyſius.

DEMARĒTA, the wife of Gelon. Diod. 15.

DEMARISTE, the mother of Timoleon.

DĒMĀTRIA, a Spartan mother, who killed her ſon, becauſe he returned from a battle without glory. Plut. Lac. inſt.

DEMETRIA, a feſtival in honor of Ceres, called by the Greeks Demeter. It was then cuſtomary for the votaries of the goddeſs to laſh themſelves with whips made with the bark of trees. The Athenians had a ſolemnity of the ſame name, in honor of Demetrius Poliorcetes.

DĒMĒTRIAS, a town of Theſſaly.

DĒMĒTRIUS, a ſon of Antigonus and Stratonice, ſirnamed Poliorcetes, deſtroyer of towns. At the age of 22, he was ſent by his father againſt Ptolemy, who invaded Syria. He was defeated near Gaza; but he ſoon repaired his loſs, by a victory over one of the generals of the enemy. He afterwards ſailed with a fleet of 250 ſhips to Athens, and reſtored the Athenians to liberty, by freeing them from the power of Caſſander and Ptolemy, and expelling the garriſon, which was ſtationed there under Demetrius Phalereus. After this ſucceſsful expedition, he beſieged and took Munychia, and defeated Caſſander at Thermopylæ. His reception at Athens, after theſe victories, was attended with the greateſt ſervility; and the Athenians were not aſhamed to raiſe altars to him as to a god, and conſult his oracles. This uncommon ſucceſs raiſed the jealouſy of the ſucceſſors of Alexander; and Seleucus, Caſſander, and Lyſimachus, united to deſtroy Antigonus and his ſon. Their hoſtile armies met at Ipſus, B. C. 301. Antigonus was killed in the battle; and Demetrius, after a ſevere loſs, retired to Epheſus. His ill ſucceſs raiſed him many enemies; and the Athenians, who had lately adored him as a god, refuſed to admit him into their city. He ſoon after ravaged the territory of Lyſimachus, and reconciled himſelf to Seleucus, to whom he gave his daughter Stratonice in marriage. Athens now labored under tyranny; and Demetrius relieved it, and pardoned the inhabitants. The loſs of his poſſeſſions in Aſia recalled him from Greece, and he eſtabliſhed himſelf on the throne of Macedonia, by the murder of Alexander the ſon of Caſſander. Here he was continually at war with the neighbouring ſtates; and the ſuperior power of his adverſaries obliged him to leave Macedonia, after he had ſat on the throne for ſeven years. He paſſed into Aſia, and attacked ſome of the provinces of Lyſimachus with various ſucceſs; but famine and peſtilence deſtroyed the greateſt part of his army, and he retired to the court of Seleucus for ſupport and aſſiſtance. He met with a kind reception, but hoſtilities were ſoon begun; and after he had gained ſome advantages over his ſon-in-law, Demetrius was totally forſaken by his troops in the field of battle, and became an eaſy prey to the enemy. Though he was kept in confinement by his ſon-in-law, yet he maintained himſelf like a prince, and paſſed his time in hunting and in every laborious exerciſe. His ſon Antigonus offered Seleucus all his poſſeſſions, and even his perſon, to procure his father's liberty; but all proved unavailing, and Demetrius died in the 54th year of his age, after a confinement of three years, 286 B. C. His remains were given to Antigonus, and honored with a ſplendid funeral pomp at Corinth, and thence conveyed to Demetrias. His poſterity remained in poſſeſſion of the Macedonian throne till the age of Perſeus, who was conquered by the Romans. Demetrius has rendered himſelf famous for his fondneſs of diſſipation when among the diſſolute, and his love of virtue and military glory in the field of battle. He has been commended as a great warrior; and his ingenious inventions, his warlike engines, and ſtupendous machines in his war with the Rhodians, juſtify his claims to that perfect character. He has been blamed for his voluptuous indulgences; and his biographer obſerves, that no Grecian prince had more wives and concubines than Poliorcetes. His obedience and reverence to his father have been juſtly admired; and it has been obſerved, that Antigonus ordered the ambaſſadors of a foreign prince, particularly to remark the cordiality and friendſhip which ſubſiſted between him and his ſon. Plut. in vitâ—Diod. 17.—Juſtin. 1, c. 17, &c.——A prince who ſucceeded his father Antigonus on the throne of Macedonia. His father gave him as a hoſtage to the Romans. After the death of Seleucus, Antiochus Epiphanes, the deceaſed monarch's brother, uſurped the kingdom of Syria, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Antiochus Eupator. This uſurpation diſpleaſed Demetrius, who was detained at Rome; he procured his liberty on pretence of going to hunt, and fled to Syria, where the troops received him as their lawful ſovereign, B. C. 162. He put to death Eupator and Lyſias, and eſtabliſhed himſelf on his throne by cruelty and oppreſſion. Alexander Bala, the ſon of Antiochus Epiphanes, laid claims upon the crown of Syria, and defeated Demetrius in a battle, in the 12th year of his reign. Strab. 16.—Appian.—Juſtin. 34, c. 3.——The 2d, ſirnamed Nicanor, or Conqueror, was ſon of Soter, to whom he ſucceeded by the aſſiſtance of Ptolemy Philometor, after he had driven the uſurper Alexander Bala, B. C. 146. He married Cleopatra, the daughter of Ptolemy; who was, before, the wife of the expelled monarch. Demetrius gave himſelf up to luxury and voluptuouſneſs, and ſuffered his kingdom to be governed by his favorites. At that time a pretended ſon of Bala, called Diodorus Tryphon, ſeized a part of Syria; and Demetrius, to oppoſe his antagoniſt, made an alliance with the Jews, and marched into the eaſt, where he was taken by the Parthians. Phraates, king of Parthia, gave him his daughter Rhodogyne in marriage; and Cleopatra was ſo incenſed at this new connection, that that ſhe gave herſelf up to Antiochus Sidetes, her brother-in-law, and married him. Sidetes was killed in a battle againſt the Parthians, and Demetrius regained the poſſeſſion of his kingdom. His pride and oppreſſion rendered him odious, and his ſubjects aſked a king of the houſe of Seleucus, from Ptolemy Phyſcon, king of Egypt; and Demetrius, unable to reſiſt the power of his enemies, fled to Ptolemais, which was then in the hands of his wife Cleopatra. The gates were ſhut up againſt his approach, by Cleopatra; and he was killed by order of the governor of Tyre, whither he had fled for protection. He was ſucceeded by Alexander Zebina, whom Ptolemy had raiſed to the throne, B. C. 127. Juſtin. 36, &c.—Appian. de bell. Syr.—Joſeph.——The 3d, ſirnamed Eucerus, was ſon of Antiochus Gryphus. After the example of his brother Philip, who had ſeized Syria, he made himſelf maſter of Damaſcus, B. C. 93, and ſoon after obtained a victory over his brother. He was taken in a battle againſt the Parthians, and died in captivity. Joſeph. 1.——Phalereus, a diſciple of Theophraſtus, who gained ſuch an influence over the Athenians, by his eloquence, and the purity of his manners, that he was elected decennial archon, B. C. 317. He ſo embelliſhed the city, and rendered himſelf ſo popular by his munificence, that the Athenians raiſed 360 brazen ſtatues to his honor. Yet in the midſt of all this popularity, his enemies raiſed a ſedition againſt him, and he was condemned to death, and all his ſtatues thrown down, after obtaining the ſovereign power for 10 years. He fled without concern or mortification to the court of Ptolemy Lagus, where he met with kindneſs and cordiality. The Egyptian monarch conſulted him concerning the ſucceſſion of his children; and Demetrius adviſed him to raiſe to the throne the children of Eurydice, in preference to the offſpring of Berenice. This counſel ſo irritated Philadelphus, the ſon of Berenice, that after his father's death he ſent the philoſopher into upper Egypt, and there detained him in ſtrict confinement. Demetrius, tired with his ſituation, put an end to his life by the bite of an aſp, 284 B. C. According to ſome, Demetrius enjoyed the confidence of Philadelphus, and enriched his library at Alexandria with 200,000 volumes. All the works of Demetrius, on rhetoric, hiſtory and eloquence, are loſt; and the treatiſe on rhetoric, falſely attributed to him, is by ſome ſuppoſed to be the compoſition of Halicarnaſſus. The laſt edition of this treatiſe is that of Glaſgow, 8vo. 1743. *Diog. in vitâ. Veſpaſian was diſpleaſed with his inſolence, and baniſhed him to an iſland. The Cynic derided the puniſhment, and bitterly inveighed againſt the emperor. DEMO, a Sibyl of Cumæ.

DEMOANASSA, the mother of Ægialeus.

DEMOCĒDES, a celebrated phyſician of Crotona, ſon of Calliphon, and intimate with Polycrates. He was carried as a priſoner from Samos to Darius king of Perſia, where he acquired great riches and much reputation by curing the king's foot, and the breaſt of Atoſſa. He was ſent to Greece as a ſpy by the king, and fled away to Crotona, where he married the daughter of the wreſtler Milo. Ælian. V. H. 8, c. 18.—Herodot. 3, c. 124, &c.

DĒMŎCHĂRES, an Athenian ſent with ſome of his countrymen with an embaſſy to Philip king of Macedonia. The monarch gave them audience; and when he aſked them what he could do to pleaſe the people of Athens? Demochares replied, "Hang yourſelf." This impudence raiſed the indignation of all the hearers; but Philip mildly diſmiſſed them, and bade them aſk their countrymen, which deſerved moſt the appellation of wiſe and moderate, either they who gave ſuch ill language, or he who received it without any ſigns of reſentment? Senec. de Ira. 3.—*Ælian. DĒMŎCRĪTUS, a celebrated philoſopher of Abdera, diſciple to Leucippus. He travelled over the greateſt part of Europe, Aſia, and Africa, in queſt of knowledge, and returned home in the greateſt poverty. There was a law at Abdera, which deprived of the honor of a funeral the man who had reduced himſelf to indigence; and Democritus, to avoid ignominy, repeated before his countrymen one of his compoſitions called Diacosmus. It was received with ſuch uncommon applauſe, that he was preſented with 500 talents; ſtatues were erected in his honor; and a decree paſſed, that the expences of his funeral ſhould be paid from the public treaſury. He retired to a garden near the city, where he dedicated his time to ſtudy and ſolitude; and he put out his eyes, to apply himſelf more cloſely to philoſophical enquiries. He was accuſed of inſanity, and Hippocrates was ordered to enquire into the nature of his diſorder. The phyſician had a conference with the philoſopher, and declared that not Democritus, but his enemies were inſane. He continually laughed at the follies and vanity of mankind, who diſtract themſelves with care, and are at once a prey to hope and to anxiety. He told Darius, who was inconſolable for the loſs of his wife, that he would raiſe her from the dead, if he could find three perſons who had gone through life without adverſity, whoſe names he might engrave on the queen's monument. The king's enquiries to find ſuch perſons proved unavailing, and the philoſopher in ſome manner ſoothed the ſorrow of his ſovereign. He taught his diſciples, that the ſoul died with the body; and therefore, as he gave no credit to the exiſtence of ghoſts, ſome youths, to try his fortitude, dreſſed themſelves in a hideous and deformed habit, and approached his cave in the dead of night, with whatever could create terror and aſtoniſhment. The philoſopher received them unmoved; and without even looking at them, he deſired them to ceaſe making themſelves ſuch objects of ridicule and of folly. He died in the 109th year of his age, B. C. 361. His father was ſo rich, that he entertained Xerxes, with all his army, as he was marching againſt Greece. All the works of Democritus are loſt. Diog. in vitâ.—*Ælian. V. DĒMŎPŎLIS, a ſon of Themiſtocles. Plut. in Them.

DĒMOS, a place of Ithaca.

DĒMOSTHĔNES, a celebrated Athenian, ſon of a rich black-ſmith, called Demoſthenes, and of Cleobule. He was but ſeven years of age when his father died. His guardians negligently managed his affairs, and embezzled the greateſt part of his poſſeſſions. His education was totally neglected; and for whatever advances he made in learning, he was indebted to his induſtry and application. He became the pupil of Iſæus and Plato, and applied himſelf to ſtudy the the orations of Isocrates. At the age of 17, he gave an early proof of his eloquence and abilities against his guardians, from whom he obtained the retribution of the greatest part of his estate. His rising talents were, however, impeded by weak lungs, and a difficulty of pronunciation, especially of the letter ρ, but these obstacles were soon conquered by unwearied application. To correct the stammering of his voice, he spoke with pebbles in his mouth; and removed the distortion of his features, which accompanied his utterance, by watching the motions of his countenance in a looking-glass. That his pronunciation might be loud and full of emphasis, he frequently ran up the steepest and most uneven walks, where his voice acquired force and energy; and on the sea-shore, when the waves were uncommonly agitated, he declaimed aloud, to accustom himself to the noise and tumults of a public assembly. He also confined himself in a subterraneous cave, to devote himself more closely to studious pursuits; and to eradicate all curiosity of appearing in public, he shaved one half of his head. In this solitary retirement, by the help of a glimmering lamp, he composed the greatest part of his orations, which have ever been the admiration of every age, though his cotemporaries and rivals severely inveighed against them, and observed that they smelt of oil. His abilities, as an orator, raised him to consequence at Athens, and he was soon placed at the head of government. In this public capacity he roused his countrymen from their indolence, and animated them against the encroachment of Philip of Macedonia. In the battle of Cheronæa, Demosthenes betrayed his pusillanimity, and saved his life by flight. After the death of Philip, he declared himself warmly against his son and successor, Alexander, whom he branded with the appellation of boy; and when the Macedonians demanded of the Athenians, their orators, Demosthenes reminded his countrymen of the fable of the sheep which delivered their dogs to the wolves. Though he had boasted that all the gold of Macedonia could not tempt him; yet he suffered himself to be bribed by a small golden cup fyom Harpalus. The tumults which this occasioned, forced him to retire from Athens; and in his banishment, which he passed at Trœzene and Ægina, he lived with more effeminacy than true heroism. When Antipater made war against Greece, after the death of Alexander, Demosthenes was publicly recalled from his exile, and a galley was sent to fetch him from Ægina. His return was attended with much splendor, and all the citizens crowded at the Piræus to see him land. His triumph and popularity were short. Antipater and Craterus were near Athens, and demanded all the orators to be delivered up into their hands. Demosthenes with all his adherents fled to the temple of Neptune in Calauria; and when he saw that all hopes of safety were vanished, he took a dose of poison, which he always carried in a quill, and expired on the day that the Thesmophoria were celebrated, in the 60th year of his age, B. C. 322. The Athenians raised a brazen statue to his honor, with an inscription translated into this distich:

Si tibi par menti robur, Vir magne, fuisset, Græcia non Macedæ succubuisset ero.

Demosthenes has been deservedly called the prince of orators; and Cicero, his successful rival among the Romans, calls him a perfect model, and such as he wished to be. These two great princes of eloquence have often been compared together; but the judgment hesitates to which to give the preference. They both arrived at perfection; but the measures by which they obtained it, were diametrically opposite. Demosthenes has been compared, and with propriety, by his rival Æschines, to a Siren, from the melody of his expressions. No orator can be said to have expressed the various passions of hatred, resentment, or indignation, with more energy than he; and as a proof of his uncommon application, it need only be mentioned, that he transcribed eight or even 10 times the history of Thucydides, that he might not only imitate, but possess the force and energy of the great historian. The best editions of his works are that of Wolfius, fol. Frankof. 1604; that left unfinished by Taylor, Cantab. 4to. and that published in 12 vols. 8vo. 1720. &c. Lipf. by Reiske and his widow. Many of the orations of Demosthenes have been published separately. Plut. in Vitâ.—Diod. 16.—Cic. in Orat. &c.—Paus. 1, c. 8, l. 2, c. 33.——An Athenian general, sent to succeed Alcibiades in Sicily. He attacked Syracuse with Nicias, but his efforts were ineffectual. After many calamities he fell into the enemy's hands, and stabbed himself, and his army was confined to hard labor. DERCĔTO & DERCĔTIS, a goddess of Syria, called also Atergatis, whom some supposed to be the same as Astarte. She was represented as a beautiful woman above the waist, and the lower part terminated in a fish's tail. According to Diodorus, Venus, whom she had offended, made her passionately fond of a young priest, remarkable for the beauty of his features. She had a daughter by him, and became so ashamed of her incontinence, that she removed her lover, exposed the fruit of her amour, and threw herself into a lake. Her body was transformed into a fish, and her child was preserved, and called Semiramis. As she was chiefly worshipped in Syria, and represented like a fish, the Syrians antiently abstained from fishes. Lucian. de Dea Syr.—Plin. 5, c. 13.—Ovid. Met. 4. v. 44—Did. 2.

DEUCĂLION, a son of Prometheus, who married Pyrrha the daughter of Epimetheus. He reigned over part of Thessaly, and in his age the whole earth was covered with a deluge. The impiety of mankind had irritated Jupiter, who resolved to destroy mankind, and immediately the earth exhibited a boundless scene of waters. The highest mountains were climbed up by the frightened inhabitants of the country; but this seeming place of security was soon overtopped by the rising waters, and no hope was left of escaping the universal calamity. Prometheus advised his son to make himself a ship, and by this means he saved himself and his wife Pyrrha. The vessel was tossed about during nine successive days, and at last stopped on the top of mount Parnassus, where Deucalion remained till the waters had subsided. Pindar and Ovid make no mention of a vessel built by the advice of Prometheus; but, according to their relation, Deucalion saved his life by taking refuge on the top of Parnassus, or according to Hyginus, of Ætna in Sicily. As soon as the waters had retired from the surface of the earth, Deucalion and his wife went to consult the oracle of Themis, and were directed to repair the loss of mankind, by throwing behind the bones of their grandmother. This was no other than the stones of the earth; and after some hesitation about the meaning of the oracle, they obeyed. The stones thrown by Deucalion, became men, and those of Pyrrha women. According to Justin, Deucalion was not the only one who escaped from the universal calamity. Many saved their lives by ascending the highest mountains, or trusting themselves in small vessels to the mercy of the waters. This deluge, which chiefly happened in Thessaly, according to the relation of some writers, was produced by the inundation of the waters of the river Peneus, whose regular course was stopped by an earthquake near mount Ossa and Olympus. According to Xenophon, there were no less than five deluges. The first happened under Ogyges, and lasted three months. The second, which was in the age of Hercules and Prometheus, continued but one month. During the third, which happened in the reign of another Ogyges, all Attica was laid waste by the waters. Thessaly was totally covered by the waters during the fourth, which happened in the age of Deucalion. The last was during the Trojan war, and its effects were severely felt by the inhabitants of Egypt. There prevailed a report in Attica, that the waters of Deucalion's deluge had disappeared through a small aperture about a cubit wide, near Jupiter Olympius's temple; and Pausanias, who saw it, further adds, that a yearly offering of flour and honey was thrown into it with religious ceremony. The deluge of Deucalion, so much celebrated in antient history, is supposed to have happened 1503 years B. C. *Ovid. DIAMASTIGŌSIS, a feſtival at Sparta in honor of Diana Orthia, which received that name απο του μαστιγουν, from whipping, becauſe boys were whipped before the altar of the goddeſs. Theſe boys, called Bomonicæ, were originally free-born Spartans; but, in the more delicate ages, they were of mean birth, and generally of a ſlaviſh origin. This operation was performed by an officer in a ſevere and unfeeling manner; and that no compaſſion ſhould be raiſed, the prieſt ſtood near the altar with a ſmall light ſtatue of the goddeſs, which ſuddenly became heavy and inſupportable if the laſh of the whip was more lenient or leſs rigorous. The parents of the children attended the ſolemnity, and exhorted them not to commit any thing either by fear or groans, that might be unworthy of Laconian education. Theſe flagellations were ſo ſevere, that the blood guſhed in profuſe torrents, and many expired under the laſh of the whip without uttering a groan, or betraying any marks of fear. Such a death was reckoned very honorable, and the corpſe was buried with much ſolemnity, with a garland of flowers on its head. The origin of this feſtival is unknown. Some ſuppoſe, that Lycurgus firſt inſtituted it to inure the youths of Lacedæmon to bear labor and fatigue, and render them inſenſible to pain and wounds. Others maintain, that it is a mitigation of an oracle, which ordered that human blood ſhould be ſhed on Diana's altar; and, according to their opinion, Oreſtes firſt introduced that barbarous cuſtom, after he had brought the ſtatue of Diana Taurica into Greece. There is another tradition which mentions, that Pauſanias, as he was offering prayers and ſacrifices to the gods, before he engaged with Mardonius, was ſuddenly attacked by a number of Lydians who diſturbed the ſacrifice, and were at laſt repelled with ſtaves and ſtones, the only weapons with which the Lacedæmonians were provided that moment. In commemoration of this, therefore, that whipping of boys was inſtituted at Sparta, and after that the Lydian proceſſion.

DIĀNA, the goddeſs of hunting. According to Cicero, there were three of this name: a daughter of Jupiter and Proſerpine, who became mother of Cupid; a daughter of Jupiter and Latona, and a daughter of Upis and Glauce. The ſecond is the moſt celebrated, and to her all the antients allude. She was born at the ſame birth as Apollo; and the pains which ſhe ſaw her mother ſuffer during her labor, gave her ſuch an averſion to marriage, that ſhe obtained of her father to live in perpetual celibacy, and to preſide over the travails of women. To ſhun the ſociety of men, ſhe devoted herſelf to hunting, and was always accompanied by a number of choſen virgins, who, like herſelf, abjured the uſe of marriage. She is repreſented with a quiver, and attended with dogs, and ſometimes drawn in a chariot by two white ſtags. Sometimes ſhe appears with wings, holding a lion in one hand, and a panther in the other, with name Ceres received, because when she sought her daughter all over the world, all wished her success in her pursuits, with the word Ἕυρες, invenies; a εὑρω, invenio. Ovid. Met. 6. v. 114.

Derræ, a place of Messenia. Paus. 4. c. 15.

Derbices, a people near Caucasus, who kill all those that have reached their 70th year. They bury all such as die a natural death. Strab.

Dercē, a fountain in Spain, whose waters are uncommonly cold.

Dercennus, an antient king in Latium. Virg. Æn. 11. v. 850.

Dercēto & Dercētis, a goddess of Syria, called also Atergatis, whom some supposed to be the same as Astarte. She was represented as a beautiful woman above the waist, and the lower part terminated in a fish's tail. According to Diodorus, Venus, whom she had offended, made her passionately fond of a young priest, remarkable for the beauty of his features. She had a daughter by him, and became so ashamed of her incontinence, that she removed her lover, exposed the fruit of her amour, and threw herself into a lake. Her body was transformed into a fish, and her child was preserved, and called Semiramis. As she was chiefly worshipped in Syria, and represented like a fish, the Syrians antiently abstained from fishes. Lucian. de Dea Syr.—Plin. 5, c. 13.—Ovid. Met. 4. v. 44—Id. 2.

Dercyllidas, a general of Sparta, celebrated for his military exploits. He took nine different cities in eight days, and freed Chersonesus from the inroads of the Thracians by building a wall across the country. He lived B. C. 399. Diod. 14.—Xenoph. Hist. Græc. 1, &c.

Dersæi, a people of Thrace.

Derusiæi, a people of Persia.

Desudaba, a town of Media. Liv. 44, c. 26.

Deucalion, a son of Prometheus, who married Pyrrha the daughter of Epimetheus. He reigned over part of Thessaly, and in his age the whole earth was covered with a deluge. The impiety of mankind had irritated Jupiter, who resolved to destroy mankind, and immediately the earth exhibited a boundless scene of waters. The highest mountains were climbed up by the frightened inhabitants of the country; but this seeming place of security was soon overtopped by the rising waters, and no hope was left of escaping the universal calamity. Prometheus advised his son to make himself a ship, and by this means he saved himself and his wife Pyrrha. The vessel was tossed about during nine successive days, and at last stopped on the top of mount Parnassus, where Deucalion remained till the waters had subsided. Pindar and Ovid make no mention of a vessel built by the advice of Prometheus; but, according to their relation, Deucalion saved his life by taking refuge on the top of Parnassus, or according to Hyginus, of Ætna in Sicily. As soon as the waters had retired from the surface of the earth, Deucalion and his wife went to consult the oracle of Themis, and were directed to repair the loss of mankind, by throwing behind the bones of their grandmother. This was no other than the stones of the earth; and after some hesitation about the meaning of the oracle, they obeyed. The stones thrown by Deucalion, became men, and those of Pyrrha women. According to Justin, Deucalion was not the only one who escaped from the universal calamity. Many saved their lives by ascending the highest mountains, or trusting themselves in small vessels to the mercy of the waters. This deluge, which chiefly happened in Thessaly, according to the relation of some writers, was produced by the inundation of the waters of the river Peneus, whose regular courses were stopped by an earthquake near mount Ossa and Olympus. According to Xenophon, there were no less than five deluges. The first happened under Ogyges, and lasted three months. The second, which was in the age of Hercules and Prometheus, continued but one month. During the third, which happened in the reign of another Ogyges, all Attica was laid waste by the waters. Thessaly was totally covered by the waters during the fourth, which happened in the age of Deucalion. The last was during the Trojan war, and its effects were severely felt by the inhabitants of Egypt. There prevailed a report in Attica, that the waters of Deucalion's deluge had disappeared through a small aperture about a cubit wide, near Jupiter Olympius's temple; and Pausanias, who saw it, further adds, that a yearly offering of flour and honey was thrown into it with religious ceremony. The deluge of Deucalion, so much celebrated in antient history, is supposed to have happened 1503 years B. C. *Ovid. She is repreſented with a quiver, and attended with dogs, and ſometimes drawn in a chariot by two white ſtags. Sometimes ſhe appears with wings, holding a lion in one hand, and a panther in the other, with with a chariot drawn by two heifers, or two horſes of different colors. She is repreſented taller by the head than her attendant nymphs, her face has ſomething manly, her legs are bare, well ſhaped, and ſtrong, and her feet are covered with a buſkin, worn by huntreſſes among the antients. She received many ſirnames, particularly from the places where her worſhip was eſtabliſhed, and from the functions over which ſhe preſided. She was called Lucina, Ilythia, or Juno Pronuba, when invoked by women in child-bed, and Trivia when worſhipped in the croſs-ways where her ſtatues were generally erected. She was ſuppoſed to be the ſame as the moon, and Proſerpine or Hecate, and from that circumſtance ſhe was called Triformis; and ſome of her ſtatues repreſented her with three heads, that of a horſe, a dog, and a boar. Her power and functions, under theſe three characters, have been beautifully expreſſed in theſe two verſes:

Terret, luſtrat, agit, Proſerpina, Luna, Diana,
Ima, ſuprema, feras, ſceptro, fulgore, ſagittâ.

She was alſo called Agrotera, Orthia, Taurica, Delia, Cynthia, Aricia, &c. She was ſuppoſed to be the ſame as the Iſis of the Egyptians, whoſe worſhip was introduced into Greece with that of Oſiris, under the name of Apollo. When Typhon waged war againſt the gods, Diana metamorphoſed herſelf into a cat, to avoid his fury. She is generally known in the figures that repreſent her, by the creſcent on her head, by the dogs which attend her, and by her hunting habit. The moſt famous of her temples was that of Epheſus, which was one of the ſeven wonders of the world. (Vid. Epheſus.) She was there repreſented with a great number of breaſts, and other ſymbols which ſignified the earth or Cybele. Though ſhe was the patroneſs of chaſtity, yet ſhe forgot her dignity to enjoy the company of Endymion, and the very familiar favors which ſhe granted to Pan and Orion are well known. (Vid. Endymion, Pan, Orion.) The inhabitants of Taurica were particularly attached to the worſhip of this goddeſs, and they cruelly offered on her altar all the ſtrangers that were ſhipwrecked on their coaſts. Her temple in Aricia was ſerved by a prieſt who had always murdered his predeceſſor, and the Lacedæmonians yearly offered her human victims till the age of Lycurgus, who changed this barbarous cuſtom for the ſacrifice of flagellation. The Athenians generally offered her goats, and others a white kid, and ſometimes a boar pig, or an ox. Among plants the poppy and the ditamy were ſacred to her. She, as well as her brother Apollo, had ſome oracles, among which thoſe of Egypt, Cilicia, and Epheſus, are the moſt known. *Ovid. DICÆA & DICÆARCHEA, a town of Italy. Ital. 13, v. 385.

DICÆUS, an Athenian, who was ſupernaturally appriſed of the defeat of the Perſians in Greece. Herodot. 8, c. 65.

DICE, one of the Horæ, daughters of Jupiter. Apollod. 1, c. 3.

DICEARCHUS, a Meſſenian famous for his knowledge of philoſophy, hiſtory, and mathematics. He was one of Ariſtotle's diſciples. Nothing remains of his numerous compoſitions. He had compoſed an hiſtory of the Spartan republic, which was publicly read over every year by order of the magiſtrates, for the improvement and inſtruction of youth.

DICENEUS, an Egyptian philoſopher in the age of Auguſtus, who travelled into Scythia, where he ingratiated himſelf with the king of the country, and by his inſtructions ſoftened the wildneſs and ruſticity of his manners. He alſo gained ſuch an influence over the multitude, that they all deſtroyed the vines which grew in their country, to prevent the riot of diſſipation, which the wine occaſioned among them. He wrote all his maxims and his laws in a book, that they might not loſe the benefit of them after his death.

DICOMAS, a king of the Getæ. Plut. in Anton.

DICTÆ & DICTÆUS MONS, a mountain of Crete. The iſland is often known by the name of Dictæa arva. Virg. Ecl. 6. Æn. 3, v. 171.——Jupiter was called Dictæus, becauſe worſhipped there.

DICTAMNUM & DICTYNNA, a town of Crete, where the herb called dictamnus chiefly grows. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 412.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 50.

DICTĀTOR, a magiſtrate at Rome inveſted with regal authority. This officer, whoſe magiſtracy ſeems to have been borrowed from the cuſtoms of the Albans or Latins, was firſt choſen during the Roman wars againſt the Latins. The conſuls being unable to raiſe forces for the defence of the ſtate, becauſe the plebeians refuſed to inliſt, if they were not diſcharged from all the debts they had contracted contracted with the patricians, the ſenate found it neceſſary to elect a new magiſtrate with abſolute and incontrolable power to take care of the ſtate. The dictator remained in office for ſix months, after which he was again elected, if the affairs of the ſtate ſeemed to be deſperate; but if tranquillity was re-eſtabliſhed, he generally laid down his power before the time was expired. He knew no ſuperior in the republic, and even the laws were ſubjected to him. He was called dictator, becauſe dictus, named by the conſul, or quoniam dictis ejus pareat populus, becauſe the people implicitly obeyed his command. He was named by the conſul in the night, vivâ voce, and his election was confirmed by the auguries, though ſometimes he was nominated or recommended by the people. As his power was abſolute, he could proclaim war, levy forces, conduct them againſt an enemy, and diſband them at pleaſure. He puniſhed as he pleaſed; and from his deciſion there was no appeal, at leaſt till later times. He was preceded by 24 lictors, with the faſces; during his adminiſtration, all other officers, except the tribunes of the people, were ſuſpended, and he was the maſter of the republic. But amidſt all this independence, he was not permitted to go beyond the borders of Italy, and he was always obliged to march on foot in his expeditions; and he never could ride in difficult and laborious marches, without previouſly obtaining a formal leave from the people. He was choſen only when the ſtate was in imminent dangers from foreign enemies or inward ſeditions. In the time of a peſtilence, a dictator was ſometimes elected, as alſo to hold the comitia, or to celebrate the public feſtivals, to hold trials, to chuſe ſenators, or drive a nail in the capitol, by which ſuperſtitious ceremony the Romans believed that a plague could be averted, or the progreſs of an enemy ſtopped. This office, ſo reſpectable and illuſtrious in the firſt ages of the republic, became odious by the perpetual uſurpations of Sylla and J. Cæſar; and after the death of the latter, the Roman ſenate, on the motion of the conſul Antony, paſſed a decree, which for ever after forbade a dictator to exiſt in Rome. The dictator, as ſoon as elected, choſe a ſubordinate officer, called his maſter of horſe, magiſter equitum. This officer was reſpectable, but he was totally ſubſervient to the will of the dictator, and could do nothing without his expreſs order, though he enjoyed the privilege of uſing a horſe, and had the ſame inſignia as the prætors. This ſubordination, however, was ſome time after removed; and during the ſecond Punic war, the maſter of the horſe was inveſted with a power equal to that of the dictator. A ſecond dictator was alſo choſen for the election of magiſtrates at Rome, after the battle of Cannæ. The dictatorſhip was originally confined to the patricians, but the plebeians were afterwards admitted to ſhare it. Titus Lartius Flavus was the firſt dictator, A. U. C. 253. *Dionyſ. Dictidienses, certain inhabitants of mount Athos. Thucyd. 5, c. 82.

Dictynna, a nymph of Crete, who firſt invented hunting nets. She was one of Diana's attendants, and for that reaſon the goddeſs is often called Dictynna. Some have ſuppoſed that Minos purſued her, and that to avoid his importunities, ſhe threw herſelf into the ſea, and was caught in fiſhermen's nets, δίκτυα, whence her name. There was a feſtival at Sparta in honor of Diana, called Dictynnia. Pauſ. 2, c. 30. l. 3, c. 12.——A city of Crete.

Dictys, a Cretan, who went with Idomeneus to the Trojan war. It is ſuppoſed that he wrote an hiſtory of this celebrated war, and that at his death he ordered it to be laid in his tomb, where it remained till a violent earthquake in the reign of Nero opened the monument where he had been buried. This convulſion of the earth threw out his hiſtory of the Trojan war, which was found by ſome ſhepherds, and afterwards carried to Rome. This myſterious tradition is deſervedly deemed fabulous; and the hiſtory of the Trojan war, which is now extant, was compoſed in the 15th century, according to others, in the age of Conſtantine, and falſely attributed to one of the followers of Idomeneus. The edition of Dictys is by Maſellus Venia, 4to, Mediol. 1477.——A king of the iſland of Seriphus, ſon of Magnes and Nays. Didia lex, de Sumptibus, by Didius, A. U. C. 606, to reſtrain the expences that attended public feſtivals and entertainments, and limit the number of gueſts which generally attended them, not only at Rome, but in all the provinces of Italy. By it, not only thoſe who received gueſts in theſe feſtival meetings, but the gueſts themſelves, were liable to be fined. It was an extenſion of the Oppian and Fannian laws.

Didius, a governor of Spain, conquered by Sertorius. Plut. in Sert.——A man who brought brought Cæſar the head of Pompey's eldeſt ſon. Plut.——A governor of Britain, under Claudius.——Julianus, a rich Roman, who, after the murder of Pertinax, bought the empire which the Prætorians had expoſed to ſale, A. D. 192. His great luxury and extravagance rendered him odious; and when he refuſed to pay the money which he had promiſed for the imperial purple, the ſoldiers revolted againſt him, and put him to death, after a ſhort reign. Severus was made emperor after him.

Dīdo, called alſo Eliſa, a daughter of Belus king of Tyre, who married Sichæus, or Sicharbas, her uncle, who was prieſt of Hercules. Pygmalion, who ſucceeded to the throne of Tyre after Belus, murdered Sichæus, to get poſſeſſion of the immenſe riches which he had; and Dido, diſconſolate for the loſs of a huſband whom ſhe tenderly loved, and by whom ſhe was equally eſteemed, ſet ſail in queſt of a ſettlement, with a number of Tyrians, to whom the cruelty of the tyrant became odious. According to ſome accounts, ſhe threw into the ſea the riches of her huſband, which Pygmalion ſo greatly deſired; and by that artifice compelled the ſhips to fly with her, that had come by order of the tyrant, to obtain the riches of Sichæus. During her voyage, Dido viſited the coaſt of Cyprus, where ſhe carried away 50 women, who proſtituted themſelves on the ſea ſhore, and gave them as wives to her Tyrian followers. A ſtorm drove her fleet on the African coaſt, and ſhe bought of the inhabitants as much land as could be covered by a bull's hide, cut into thongs. Upon this piece of land ſhe built a citadel, called Byrſa, [Vid. Byrſa.] and the increaſe of population, and the riſing commerce among her ſubjects, ſoon obliged her to enlarge her city, and the boundaries of her dominions. Her beauty, as well as the fame of her enterprize, gained her many admirers; and her ſubjects wiſhed to compel her to marry Iarbas, king of Mauritania, who threatened them with a dreadful war. Dido begged three months to give her deciſive anſwer; and during that time, ſhe erected a funeral pile, as if wiſhing, by a ſolemn ſacrifice, to appeaſe the manes of Sichæus, to which ſhe had promiſed eternal fidelity. When all was prepared, ſhe ſtabbed herſelf on the pile in preſence of her people, and by this uncommon action obtained the name of Dido, valiant woman, inſtead of Eliſa. According to Virgil and Ovid, the death of Dido was cauſed by the ſudden departure of Æneas, of whom ſhe was deeply enamoured, and whom ſhe could not obtain as a huſband. This poetical fiction repreſents Æneas as living in the age of Dido, and introduces an anachroniſm of near 300 years. Dido left Phœnicia 247 years after the Trojan war, or the age of Æneas, that is, about 953 years B. C. This chronological error proceeds not from the ignorance of the poets, but it is ſupported by the authority of Horace,

"Aut famam ſequere, aut ſibi convenientia finge."

While Virgil deſcribes, in a beautiful epiſode, the deſperate love of Dido, and the ſubmiſſion of Æneas to the will of the gods; he at the ſame time gives an explanation of the hatred which exiſted between the republics of Rome and Carthage, and informs his readers that their mutual enmity originated in their very firſt foundation, and was apparently kindled by a more remote cauſe than the jealouſy and rivalſhip of two floriſhing empires. Dido, after her death, was honored as a deity by her ſubjects. Juſtin. 18, c. 4, &c.—Paterc. 1, c. 6.—Virg. Æn.—Ovid. Met. 14, fab. 2.—Appian. Alex.—Oros. 4.—Herodian.—Dionyſ. Hal.

Dii, the divinities of the ancient inhabitants of the earth were very numerous. Every object which cauſed terror, inſpired gratitude, or beſtowed affluence, received the tribute of veneration. Man ſaw a ſuperior perior agent in the ſtars, the elements, or the trees, and ſuppoſed that the waters which communicated fertility to his fields and poſſeſſions, were under the influence and direction of ſome inviſible power, inclined to favor and to benefit mankind. Thus aroſe a train of divinities, which imagination arrayed in different forms, and armed with different powers. They were endowed with underſtanding, and were actuated by the ſame paſſions which daily afflict the human race, and thoſe children of ſuperſtition were appeaſed or provoked as the imperfect being which gave them birth. Their wrath was mitigated by ſacrifices and incenſe, and ſometimes human victims bled to expiate a crime which ſuperſtition alone ſuppoſed to exiſt. The ſun, from his powerful influence and animating nature, firſt attracted the notice, and claimed the adoration of the uncivilized inhabitants of the earth. The moon alſo was honored with ſacrifices, and addreſſed in prayers; and after immortality had been liberally beſtowed on all the heavenly bodies, mankind claſſed among their deities the brute creation, and the cat and the ſow ſhared equally with Jupiter himſelf, the father of gods and men, the devout veneration of their votaries. This immenſe number of deities have been divided into different claſſes, according to the will and pleaſure of the mythologiſts. The Romans, generally ſpeaking, reckoned two claſſes of the gods, the dii majorum gentium, or dii conſulentes, and the dii minorum gentium. The former were twelve in number, ſix males and ſix females. [Vid. Conſentes.] In the claſs of the latter, were ranked all the gods which were worſhipped in different parts of the earth. Beſides theſe, there were ſome called dii ſelecti, ſometimes claſſed with the twelve greater gods; theſe were Janus, Saturn, the Genius, the Moon, Pluto, and Bacchus. There were alſo ſome called demi-gods, that is, who deſerved immortality by the greatneſs of their exploits, and for their uncommon ſervices to mankind. Among theſe were Priapus, Vertumnus, Hercules, and thoſe whoſe parents were ſome of the immortal gods. Beſides theſe, all the paſſions, and the moral virtues, were reckoned as powerful deities, and temples were raiſed to a goddeſs of concord, peace, &c. According to the authority of Heſiod, there were no leſs than 30,000 gods that inhabited the earth, and were guardians of men, all ſubvervient to the power of Jupiter. To theſe ſucceeding ages have added an almoſt equal number; and indeed they were ſo numerous, and their functions ſo various, that we find temples erected, and ſacrifices offered to unknown gods. It is obſervable, that all the gods of the ancients have lived upon earth as mere mortals; and even Jupiter, who was the ruler of heaven, is repreſented by the mythologiſts as a helpleſs child; and we are acquainted with all the particulars that attended the birth and education of Juno. In proceſs of time, not only good and virtuous men, who had been the patrons of learning and the ſupporters of liberty, but alſo thieves and pirates, were admitted among the gods; and the Roman ſenate courteouſly granted immortality to the moſt cruel and abandoned of their emperors.

This project Alexander rejected as too chimerical, but he employed the talents of the artiſt in building and beautifying Alexandria. He began to build a temple in honor of Arſinoe, by order of Ptolemy Philadelphus, in which he intended to ſuſpend a ſtatue of the queen, by means of loadſtones. His death, and that of his royal patron, prevented the execution of a work which would have been the admiration of every age. Plin. 7, c. 37.—Marcell. 22, c. 40.—Plut. in Alex.——A general of Agathocles.——A Meſſenian, DIOCLETIANOPŎLIS, a town of Theſſaly, called ſo in honor of Diocletian.

DIOCLETIĂNUS, (Caius Valerius Jovius) a celebrated Roman emperor, born of an obſcure family in Dalmatia. He was firſt a common ſoldier, and by merit and ſucceſs he gradually roſe to the office of a general, and at the death of Numerian, he was inveſted with imperial power. In this high ſtation, he rewarded the virtues and fidelity of Maximian, who had ſhared with him all the ſubordinate offices in the army, by making him his colleague on the throne. He created two ſubordinate emperors, Conſtantius and Galerius, whom he called Cæſars, whilſt he claimed for himſelf and his colleague the ſuperior title of Auguſtus. Diocletian has been celebrated for his military virtues; and though he was naturally unpoliſhed by education and ſtudy, yet he was the friend and patron of learning and true genius. He was bold and reſolute, active and diligent, and well acquainted with the arts, which will endear a ſovereign to his people, and make him reſpectable even in the eyes of his enemies. His cruelty, however, againſt the followers of Chriſtianity, has been deſervedly branded with the appellation of unbounded tyranny, and inſolent wantonneſs. After he had reigned 21 years in the greateſt proſperity, he publicly abdicated the crown at Nicomedia, on the firſt of May, A. D. 304, and retired to a private ſtation at Salona. Maximian, his colleague, followed his example, but not from voluntary choice; and when he ſome time after endeavoured to rouſe the ambition of Diocletian, and perſuade him to re-aſſume the imperial purple, he received for anſwer, that Diocletian took now more delight in cultivating his little garden, than he formerly enjoyed in a palace, when his power was extended over all the earth. He lived nine years after his abdication, in the greateſt ſecurity and enjoyment at Salona, and died in the 68th year of his age. Diocletian is the firſt ſovereign who voluntarily reſigned his power: a philoſophical reſolution, which, in later years, was imitated by the emperor Charles the fifth of Germany.

DIŎDŌRUS, an hiſtorian, ſirnamed Siculus, becauſe he was born at Argyra in Sicily. He wrote an hiſtory of Egypt, Perſia, Syria, Media, Greece, Rome, and Carthage, which was divided into 40 books, of which only 15 are extant, with ſome few fragments. This valuable compoſition was the work of an accurate enquirer, and it is ſaid that he viſited all the places of which he has made mention in his hiſtory. It was the labor of 30 years, though the greater part may be deſcribed as a judicious compilation from Beroſus, Timæus, Theopompus, Calliſthenes, and others. He is, however, too credulous in ſome of his narrations, and often wanders far from the truth. His ſtyle is neither elegant, nor too labored; but it contains great ſimplicity, and unaffected correctneſs. He often dwells too long upon fabulous reports and trifling incidents, while events of the greateſt importance to hiſtory are treated with brevity, and ſometimes paſſed over in ſilence. His manner of reckoning, by the Olympiads and the Roman conſuls, will be found very erroneous. The hiſtorian floriſhed about 44 years, B. C. he ſpent much time at Rome to procure information, and authenticate his hiſtorical narrations. The beſt edition of his works, is that of Weſſeling, 2 vols. fol. Diogenes, a celebrated Cynic philosopher of Sinope, banished from his country for coining false money. From Sinope he retired to Athens, where he became the disciple of Antisthenes, who was at the head of the Cynics. Antisthenes, at first refused to admit him into his house, and even struck him with a stick. Diogenes calmly bore the rebuke, and said, strike me, Antisthenes, but never shall you find a stick sufficiently hard, to remove me from your presence, whilst there is any thing to be learnt, any information to be gained from your conversation, and acquaintance. Such firmness recommended him to Antisthenes, and he became his most devoted pupil. He dressed himself in the garment which distinguished the Cynics, and walked about the streets with a tub on his head, which served him as a house and a place of repose. Such singularity joined to the greatest contempt for riches, soon gained him reputation, and Alexander the Great condescended to visit the philosopher in his tub. He asked Diogenes if there was any thing in which he could gratify or oblige him. Get out of my sun-shine, was the only answer which the philosopher gave. Such an independence of mind so pleased the monarch, that he turned to his courtiers, and said, were I not Alexander, I would wish to be Diogenes. He was once sold as a slave, but his magnanimity so pleased his master, that he made him the preceptor of his children, and the guardian of his estates. After a life spent in the greatest misery and indigence, he died B. C. 324, in the 96th year of his age. He ordered his body to be carelessly thrown into a ditch, and some dust to be sprinkled over it. His orders were, however, disobeyed in this particular, and his friends honored his remains with a magnificent funeral at Corinth. The inhabitants of Sinope, raised statues to his memory, and the marble figure of a dog was placed on a high column erected on his tomb. His biographer has transmitted to posterity, a number of sayings, remarkable for their simplicity and moral tendency. The life of Diogenes, however, shrinks from the eye of a strict examination, he boasted of his poverty, and was so arrogant that many have observed that the virtues of Diogenes, arose from pride and vanity, not from wisdom or sound philosophy. His morals were corrupted, and he gave way to the most vicious indulgences, and his unbounded wantonness has given occasion to some to observe, that the bottom of his tub would not bear too close an examination. *Diog. in vitâ. He lived in the age of Anaxagoras. Diog. in vitâ. —— Laertius, an Epicurean philosopher, born in Cilicia. He wrote the lives of the philosophers in ten books still extant. This work contains an accurate account of the antient philosophers, and is replete with all their anecdotes, and particular opinions. It is compiled, however, without any plan, method, or precision, though much neatness and conciseness is observable through the whole. In this multifarious biography the author does not seem particularly partial to any sect, except perhaps it be that of Potamon of Alexandria. Diogenes died A. D. 222. Diomedes, son of Tydeus and Deiphyle, was king of Ætolia, and one of the bravest of the Grecian chiefs in the Trojan war. He often engaged Hector and Æneas, and wounded Venus in the arm, and obtained much military glory. He went with Ulysses to steal the Palladium from the temple of Minerva in Troy, and assisted in murdering Rhesus, king of Thrace, and carrying away his horses. At his return from the siege of Troy, he lost his way in the darkness of night, and landed in Attica, where his companions plundered the country, and lost the Trojan Palladium. During his long absence, his wife Ægiale forgot her marriage vows, and prostituted herself to Cometes, one of her servants. This lasciſioufneſs of the queen was attributed by ſome to the reſentment of Venus, whom Diomedes had ſeverely wounded in a battle before Troy. The infidelity of Ægiale was highly diſpleaſing to Diomedes. He reſolved to abandon his native country which was the ſeat of his diſgrace, and the attempts of his wife to take away his life, according to ſome accounts, did not a little contribute to haſten his departure. He came to that part of Italy, which has been called Magna Græcia, where he built a city, which he called Argyrippa, and married the daughter of Daunus, the king of the country. He died there in extreme old age, or, according to a certain tradition, he periſhed by the hand of his father-in-law. His death was greatly lamented by his companions, who in the exceſs of their grief were changed into birds reſembling ſwans. Theſe birds took flight into a neighbouring iſland in the Adriatic, and became remarkable for the tameneſs with which they approached the Greeks, and for the horror with which they ſhunned all other nations. They are called the birds of Diomedes. Altars were raiſed to Diomedes, as to a god, one of which Strabo mentions at Timavus. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 243. &c. *Ovid. DION, a Syracuſan, ſon of Hipparinus, famous for his power and abilities. He was related to Dionyſius, and often adviſed him together with the philoſopher Plato, who at his requeſt had come to reſide at the tyrant's court, to lay aſide the ſupreme power. His great popularity rendered him odious in the eyes of the tyrant, who baniſhed him to Greece. There he collected a numerous force, and reſolved to free his country from tyranny. This he eaſily effected on account of his uncommon popularity. He entered the port of Syracuſe only in two ſhips, and in three days reduced under his power, an empire, which had already ſubſiſted for 50 years, and which was guarded by 500 ſhips of war, and 100,000 foot, and 10,000 horſe. The tyrant fled to Corinth, and Dion kept the power in his own hands, fearful of the aſpiring ambition of ſome of the friends of Dionyſius. He was ſhamefully betrayed and murdered by one of his familiar friends, called Callicrates, or Callipus 354 years before the Chriſtian era, in the 55th year of his age, and 4 years after his return from Peloponneſus. His death was univerſally lamented by the Syracuſans, and a monument raiſed to his memory. Diod. 16. C. Nep. in vit.——A town of Macedonia. Pauſ. 9, c. 36.——Caſſius, a native of Nicæa in Bithynia. His father's name was Apronianus. He was raiſed to the greateſt offices of ſtate in the Roman empire by Pertinax, and his three ſucceſſors. He was naturally fond of ſtudy, and he improved himſelf by unwearied application. He was ten years in collecting materials for an hiſtory of Rome, which he made public in 80 books, after a laborious employment of 12 years in compoſing it. This valuable hiſtory began with the arrival of Æneas in Italy, down to the reign of the emperor Alexander Severus. The 34 firſt books are totally loſt, the 20 following are mutilated, and fragments are all that we poſſeſs of the laſt 20. In the compilation of his extenſive hiſtory, Dion propoſed to himſelf Thucydides for a model; but he is not perfectly happy in his imitation. His ſtile is pure and elegant, and his narrations are judiciouſly managed, and his reflections learned; but upon the whole he is credulous, and the bigotted ſlave of partiality, ſatire, and flattery. He inveighs againſt the republican principles of Brutus and Cicero, and extols the cauſe of Cæſar. Seneca is the object of his ſatyr, and he repreſents him as debauched and licentious in his morals. Dion floriſhed about the 230th year of the Chriſtian era. The beſt edition of his works is that of Reimarus, 2. vol. fol. Hamb. 1750. —— A famous Chriſtian writer, ſurnamed Chryſoſtom, &c. ——

DIŌNÆA, a ſurname of Venus, ſuppoſed to be the daughter of Jupiter and Dione.

DIONŸSIA, feſtivals in honor of Bacchus among the Greeks. Their form and ſolemnity was firſt introduced into Greece from Egypt by a certain Melampus, and if we admit that Bacchus is the ſame as Iſis, the Dionyſia of the Greeks, are the ſame as the feſtivals celebrated by the Egyptians, in honor of Iſis. They were obſerved at Athens with more ſplendor and ceremonious ſuperſtition than in any other part of Greece.

The

The years were numbered by their celebration, the Archon assisted at the solemnity and the priests that officiated were honoured with the most dignified seats at the public games. At first they were celebrated with great simplicity, and the time was consecrated to mirth. It was then usual to bring a vessel of wine adorned with a vine branch, after which followed a goat, basket of figs, and the φαλλοι. The worshippers imitated in their dress and actions the poetical fictions concerning Bacchus. They cloathed themselves in fawn's skins, fine linen, and mitres, they carried thyrsi, drums, pipes, and flutes, and crowned themselves with garlands of ivy, vine, fir, &c. Some imitated Silenus, Pan, and the Satyrs by the uncouth manner of their dress and their fantastical motions. Some rode upon asses, and others drove the goats to slaughter for the sacrifice. In this manner both sexes joined in the solemnity, and ran about the hills and country, nodding their heads, dancing in ridiculous postures, and filling the air with hideous shrieks and shouts, and crying aloud, Evoe Bacche! Io! Io! Evoe! Iacche! Iobacche! Evohæ! With such solemnities were the festivals of Bacchus celebrated by the Greeks, particularly the Athenians. In one of these there followed a number of persons carrying sacred vessels, one of which contained water. After these came a select number of noble virgins carrying little baskets of gold filled with all sorts of fruits. This was the most mysterious part of the solemnity. Serpents were sometimes put in the baskets, and by their wreathing and crawling out they amused and astonished the beholders. After the virgins followed a company of men carrying poles at the end of which were fastened φαλλοι. The heads of these men, who were called φαλλοφοροι, were crowned with ivy and violets, and their faces covered with other herbs. They marched singing songs upon the occasion of the festivals, called φαλλικα ασματα. Next to the φαλλοφοροι followed the ὑφαλλοι in womens apparel, with white striped garments reaching to the ground; their heads were decked with garlands, and on their hands they wore gloves composed of flowers. Their gestures and actions were like those of a drunken man. Besides these, there were a number of persons called λικνοφοροι who carried the λικνον or mystical van of Bacchus; without their attendance none of the festivals of Bacchus were celebrated with due solemnity, and on that account the god is often called λικνιτης. The festivals of Bacchus were almost innumerable. The name of the most celebrated were the Dionysia αρχαιωτερα at Limnæ in Attica. The chief persons that officiated were fourteen women called γεραιραι venerable. They were appointed by one of the archons, and before their appointment they solemnly took an oath before the archon or his wife, that their body was free from all pollution. —— The greater Dionysia, sometimes called ἀστικα or τα κατ' ἀστυ as being celebrated within the city, were the most famous. They were supposed to be the same as the preceding. —— The less Dionysia, sometimes called τα κατ' αγρους, because celebrated in the country, or ληναια from ληνος a wine press, were to all appearance a preparation for the greater festivals. They were celebrated in autumn —— The Dionysia βραυρωνια observed at Brauron in Attica were a scene of lewdness, extravagance, and debauchery. —— The Dionysia νυκτηλια were observed by the Athenians in honor of Bacchus Nyctelius. It was unlawful to reveal whatever was seen or done during the celebration. — The Dionysia, called ωμοφαγια because human victims were offered to the god, or because the priests imitated the eating of raw flesh, were celebrated with much solemnity. The priests put serpents in their hair, and by the wildness of their looks and the oddity of their actions they feigned insanity. —— The Dionysia αρκαδικα were yearly observed in Arcadia, and the children who had been instructed in the music of Philoxenus and Timotheus were introduced in a theatre, where they celebrated the festivals of Bacchus by entertaining the spectators with songs, dances, and different exhibitions. There were besides these, others of inferior note. There was also one observed every three years called Dionysia τριετηρικα, and it it said that Bacchus instituted it himself in commemoration of his Indian expedition, in which he spent three years. There is also another, celebrated every fifth year, as mentioned by the scholiast of Aristophanes. —All these festivals in honor of the god of wine were celebrated by the Greeks with great licentiousness, and they contributed much to the corruption of morals in all ranks of people. They were also introduced into Tuscany, and from thence to Rome. Among the Romans both sexes promiscuously joined in the celebration during the darkness of night. The drunkenness, the debauchery, and impure actions and indulgences, which soon prevailed at the solemnity, called aloud for the interference of the senate, and the consuls Sp. Posthumius Albinus and Q. Martius Philippus made a strict examination concerning the propriety and superstitious forms of the Bacchanalia. The disorder and pollution which was practised with impunity by no less than 7,000 votaries of either ſex, was beheld with horror and aſtoniſhment by the conſuls, and the Bacchanalia were for ever baniſhed from Rome by a decree of the ſenate. They were again reinſtituted there in length of time, but not with ſuch licentiouſneſs as before.

Dionȳsipŏlis, a town of Thrace. Mela. 2, c. 2.

Dionsȳius 1ſt, or the elder, was ſon of Hermocrates. He ſignalized himſelf in the wars which the Syracuſans carried on againſt the Carthaginians, and taking advantage of the power lodged in his hands, he made himſelf abſolute at Syracuſe. To ſtrengthen himſelf in his uſurpation and acquire popularity, he encreaſed the pay of the ſoldiers, and recalled thoſe that had been baniſhed. He vowed eternal enmity againſt Carthage, and experienced various ſucceſs in his wars againſt that republic. He was ambitious of being thought a poet, and his brother Theodorus was commiſſioned to go to Olympia, and repeat there ſome verſes in his name, with other competitors, for the poetical prizes. His expectations were fruſtrated, and his poetry was received with groans and hiſſes. He was not however, ſo unſucceſsful at Athens, where a poetical prize was publicly adjudged to one of his compoſitions. This victory gave him more pleaſure than all the victories he had ever obtained in the field of battle. His tyranny and cruelty at home rendered him odious in the eyes of his ſubjects, and he became ſo ſuſpicious that he never admitted his wife or children to his private apartments without a previous examination of their garments. He never truſted his head to a barber, but always burnt his beard. He made a ſubterraneous cave in a rock, ſaid to be ſtill extant, in the form of a human ear, which meaſured 80 in height and 250 in length. It was called the ear of Dionyſius. The ſounds of this ſubterraneous cave were all neceſſarily directed to one common tympanum which had a communication with an adjoining room where Dionyſius ſpent the greateſt part of his time to hear whatever was ſaid by thoſe whom his ſuſpicion and cruelty had confined in the apartments above. The artiſts that had been employed in making this cave were all put to death by order of the tyrant, for fear of their revealing to what purpoſes a work of ſuch uncommon conſtruction was to be appropriated. His impiety and ſacrilege were as conſpicuous as his ſuſpicious credulity. He took a golden mantle from the ſtatue of Jupiter, obſerving that the ſon of Saturn had too warm a covering for the ſummer, and too cold for the winter, and he placed one of wool inſtead. He alſo robbed Æſculapius of his golden beard, and plundered the temple of Proſerpine. He died of an indigeſtion in the 63d year of his age, B. C. 368, after a reign of 38 years. Authors are divided about the manner of his death, and ſome are of opinion that he died a violent death. Some ſuppoſe that this tyrant invented the catapulta, an engine which proved of infinite ſervice for the diſcharging of ſhowers of darts and ſtones in the time of a ſiege. Diod. 13, 14, &c.—Juſtin. 20, c. 1, &c.—Xenoph. Hiſt. Græc.—C. Nep. Timol.—Plut. in Dion.——The ſecond of that name, ſirnamed the younger, was ſon of Dionyſius the 1ſt, by Doris. He ſucceeded his father as tyrant of Sicily, and by the advice of Dion his brother-in-law, he invited the philoſopher Plato to his court, under whom he ſtudied for a while. The philoſopher adviſed him to lay aſide the ſupreme power, and in his admonitions he was warmly ſeconded by Dion. Dionyſius refuſed to conſent, and ſoon after Plato was ſeized, and Dion on account of his great popularity, was ſeverely abuſed, and his wife given in marriage to another. Such a violent behaviour was highly reſented, Dion, who was baniſhed, collected ſome forces in Greece and in three days rendered himſelf maſter of Syracuſe, and expelled the tyrant B. C. 357. [Vid. Dion.] Dionyſius retired to Locri, where he behaved with the greateſt oppreſſion, and was ejected by the citizens. He recovered Syracuſe ten years after his expulſion, but his triumph was ſhort, and the Corinthians under the conduct of Timoleon obliged him to retire from the city. He fled to Corinth, where to ſupport himſelf he kept a ſchool, as Cicero obſerves, that he might ſtill continue to be tyrant; and as he could not command over men, he might ſtill exerciſe his power over boys. It is ſaid that he died from an exceſs of joy when he heard that a tragedy of his own compoſition had been rewarded with a poetical prize. Dionyſius was as cruel as his father, but he did not like him poſſeſs the art of retaining his power. This was ſeen and remarked by the old man, who, when he ſaw his ſon attempting to debauch the wives of ſome of his ſubjects, aſked asked him with the greatest indignation, whether he had ever heard of his having acted so brutal a part in his younger days? No, answered the son, because you were not the son of a king. Well, my son, replied the old man, never shalt thou be the father of a king. Justin. 21, c. 1, 2, &c. —Diod. 15, &c.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 8.—Quintil. 8, c. 6.—C. Nep. in Dion.—Cic. Tusc. 5, c. 2.——An historian of Halicarnassus, who left his country and came to reside at Rome, that he might carefully study all the Greek and Latin writers, whose compositions treated of the Roman history. He made acquaintance with all the learned of the age, and derived much information from their company and conversation. After an unremitted application, during 24 years he gave to the world his Roman antiquities in 20 books, of which only the 11 first are now extant, nearly containing the account of 312 years. His composition has been greatly valued by the antients as well as the moderns for the easiness of his style, the fidelity of his chronology, and the judiciousness of his remarks and criticisms. Like a faithful historian, he never mentioned any thing, but what was authenticated, and totally disregarded the fabulous traditions which fill and disgrace the pages of both his predecessors and followers. To the character of the elegant historian Dionysius also added that of the eloquent orator, the critic, and the politician, as may be seen in his treatises. He lived during the Augustan age, and came to Rome about 30 years before the Christian era. The best edition of his works are that of Oxford, 2 vol. fol. 1704, and that of Reiske, 6 vols. 8vo. Lipsi. 1774.——A tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus in the age of Alexander the Great. After the death of the conqueror and of Perdiccas, he married Amestris, the niece of king Darius, and assumed the title of king. He was of such an uncommon corpulence that he never exposed his person in public, and when he gave audience to foreign ambassadors he always placed himself in a chair which was conveniently made to hide his face and person from the eyes of the spectators. When he was asleep it was impossible to awake him without boring his flesh with pins. He died in the 55th year of his age. As his reign was remarkable for mildness and popularity, his death was severely lamented by his subjects. He left two sons and a daughter, and appointed his widow queen regent.——A surname of Bacchus.——A disciple of Chæremon.——A native of Chalcis, who wrote a book intitled κτισεις or the origins of cities.——A commander of the Ionian fleet against the Persians, who went to plunder Phœnicia, Herodot. 6, c. 17.——A general of Antiochus Hierax.——A philosopher of Heraclea, disciple to Zeno. DIRCE, a woman whom Lycus, king of Thebes, married after he had divorced Antiope. When Antiope became pregnant by Jupiter, Dirce ſuſpected her huſband of infidelity to her bed, and impriſoned Antiope, whom ſhe tormented with the greateſt cruelty. Antiope eſcaped from her confinement, and brought forth Amphion and Zethus on mount Cithæron. When theſe children were informed of the cruelties to which their mother had been expoſed, they beſieged Thebes, put Lycus to death, and tied the cruel Dirce to the tail of a wild bull, who dragged her over rocks and precipices, and expoſed her to the moſt poignant pains till the gods pitied her fate, and changed her into a fountain, in the neighbourhood of Thebes. According to ſome accounts Antiope was mother to Amphion and Zethus, before ſhe was confined and expoſed to the tyranny of Dirce. (*Vid. Amphion. DISCORDIA, a malevolent deity, daughter of Nox, and ſiſter to Nemeſis, the Parcæ and Death. She was driven from heaven by Jupiter, becauſe ſhe ſowed diſſenſions among the gods, and was the cauſe of continual quarrels. When the nuptials of Peleus and Thetis were celebrated, the goddeſs of diſcord was not invited, and this ſeeming neglect ſo irritated her that ſhe threw an apple into the midſt of the aſſembly of the Gods with the inſcription of detur pulchriori. This apple was the cauſe of the ruin of Troy, and of infinite misfortunes to the Greeks. (Vid. Paris.) She is repreſented with a pale ghaſtly look, her garment is torn, her eyes ſparkle with fire, and in her boſom, ſhe holds a dagger concealed. Her head is generally entwined with ſerpents, and ſhe is attended by Bellona. She is ſuppoſed to be the cauſe of all the diſſenſions which ariſe upon earth, public as well as private. *Virg. Dōdōna, a town of Theſprotia in Epirus, or according to others in Theſſaly. There was in its neighbourhood a celebrated oracle of Jupiter. The town and temple of the god was firſt built by Deucalion, after the univerſal deluge. It was ſuppoſed to be the moſt ancient oracle of all Greece, and according to the traditions of the Egyptians mentioned by Herodotus, it was founded by a dove. Two black doves, as he relates, took their flight from the city of Thebes, in Egypt, one of which flew to the temple of Jupiter Ammon and the other to Dodona, where with a human voice they acquainted the inhabitants of the country that Jupiter had conſecrated the ground, which in future would give oracles. The extenſive grove which ſurrounded Jupiter's temple was endowed with the gift of prophecy, and oracles were frequently delivered by the ſacred oaks, and the doves which inhabited the place. This fabulous tradition of the oracular power of the doves, is explained by Herodotus, who obſerves that ſome Phœnicians carryed away two prieſteſſes from Egypt, one of which went to fix her reſidence at Dodona, where the oracle was eſtabliſhed. It may further be obſerved that the fable might have been founded upon the double meaning of the word πελειαι, which ſignifies doves, in moſt parts of Greece, while in the dialect of the Epirots, it implies old women. In antient times the oracles were delivered by the murmuring of a neighbouring fountain, but the cuſtom was afterwards changed. Large kettles were ſuſpended in the air near a brazen ſtatue, which held a laſh in its hand. When the wind blew ſtrong, the ſtatue was agitated and ſtruck againſt one of the kettles, which communicated the motion to all the reſt, and raiſed that clattering and diſcordant din which continued for a while, and from which the artifice of the prieſts drew the predictions. Some ſuppoſe that the noiſe was occaſioned by the ſhaking of the leaves and boughs of an old oak, which the ſuperſtition of the people frequently conſulted, and from which they pretended to receive oracles. It may be obſerved with more probability that the oracles were delivered by the prieſts, who, by artfully concealing themſelves behind the oaks, gave occaſion to the ſuperſtitious multitude to believe that the trees were endowed with the power of prophecy. As the ſhip Argo was built with ſome of the oaks of the foreſt of Dodona, there were ſome beams which gave oracles to the Argonauts, and warned them againſt the approach of calamity. Within the foreſt of Dodona there was a ſtream and a fountain of cool water which had the power of lighting a torch as ſoon as it touched it. This fountain was totally dry at noon day, and was reſtored to its full courſe at midnight, from which time till the following noon it began to decreaſe and at the uſual hour was again deprived of its waters. The oracles of Dodona were generally delivered by women. *(Vid. Dodonides.) Dōdōnē, a daughter of Jupiter and Europa.----A fountain in the foreſt of Dodona. Vid. Dodona.

Dōdōnĭdes, the prieſteſſes who gave oracles in the temple of Jupiter in Dodona. According to ſome traditions the temple was originally inhabited by ſeven daughters of Atlas, who nurſed Bacchus. Their names were Ambroſia, Eudora, Paſithoe, Pytho, Plexaure, Coronis, Tythe or Tyche. In the latter ages the oracles were always delivered by three old women, which cuſtom was firſt eſtabliſhed when Jupiter enjoyed the company of Dione, whom he permitted to receive divine honor in his temple at Dodona. The Bœotians were the only people of Greece who received their oracles at Dodona from men, for reaſons which Strabo. l. 9, fully explains.

Doii, a people of Arabia Felix.

Dolabella P. Corn. a Roman who married the daughter of Cicero. During the civil wars he warmly eſpouſed the intereſt of J. Cæſar, whom he accompanied at the famous battles at Pharſalia, Africa, and Munda. He was made conſul by his patron, though M. Antony his colleague oppoſed it. After the death of J. Cæſar, he received the government of Syria, as his province. Caſſius oppoſed his views, and Dolabella, for violence, and for the aſſaſſination of Trebonius, one of Cæſar's murderers, was declared an enemy to the republic of Rome. He was beſieged by Caſſius in Laodicea, and when he ſaw that all was loſt, he killed himſelf, in the 27th year of his age. He was of a ſmall ſtature, which gave occaſion to his father-in-law to aſk him once when he entered his houſe who had tied him ſo cleverly to his ſword. —— A proconſul of Africa.---Another who conquered the Gauls, Etrurians, and Boii at Domitia Longina, a Roman lady who boaſted in her debaucheries. She was the wife of the emperor Domitian

Domĭtiānus, Titus Flavius, ſon of Veſpaſian and Flavia Domitilla, made himſelf emperor of Rome, at the death of his brother Titus, whom according to ſome accounts he deſtroyed by poiſon. The beginning of his reign promiſed tranquillity to the people, but their expectations were ſoon fruſtrated. Domitian became cruel, and gave way to inceſtuous and unnatural indulgences. He commanded himſelf to be called God and Lord in all the papers which were preſented to him. He paſſed the greateſt part of the day in catching flies and killing them with a bodkin, ſo that it was wittily anſwered by Vibius to a perſon who aſked him who was with the emperor, no body, not even a fly. In the latter part of his reign Domitian became ſuſpicious, and his anxieties were increaſed by the predictions of aſtrologers, but ſtill more poignantly by the ſtings of remorſe. He was ſo diſtruſtful even when alone, that round the terrace, where he uſually walked, he built a wall with ſhining ſtones, that from them he might perceive as in a looking glaſs, whether any body followed him. All theſe precautions were unavailing, he periſhed by the hand of an aſſaſſin the 18th of September A. D. 96, in the 45th year of his age, and the 15th of his reign. He was the laſt of the 12 Cæſars. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf for his love of learning, and in a little treatiſe, which he wrote upon the great care which ought to be taken of the hair to prevent baldneſs, he diſplayed much taſte and elegance, according to the obſervations of his biographers. After his death he was publicly deprived by the ſenate of all the honors which had been profuſely heaped upon him, and even his body was left in the open air without the honors of a funeral. This diſgrace might proceed from the reſentment of the ſenators, whom he had expoſed to terror as well as to ridicule. He once aſſembled that auguſt body to know in what veſſel a turbot might be more conveniently dreſſed. At another time they received a formal invitation to a feaſt, and when they arrived at the palace, they were introduced into a large gloomy hall hung with black, and lighted with a few glimmering tapers. In the middle was placed a number of coffins, on each of which was inſcribed the name of ſome one of the invited ſenators. On a ſudden a number of men burſt into the room, cloathed in black, with drawn ſwords and flaming torches, and after they had for ſome time terrified the gueſts, they permitted them to retire. Such were the amuſements and cruelties of a man, who in the firſt part of his reign was looked upon as the father of his people, and the reſtorer of learning and liberty. Suet. in vitâ.—Eutrop. 7.

Dŏris, a country of Greece, between Phocis, Theſſaly, and Acarnania. It received its name from Dorus the ſon of Deucalion, who made a ſettlement there. It was called Tetrapolis, from the four cities of Pindus, or Dryopis, Erineum, Cytinium, Borium, which it contained. To theſe four ſome add Lilæum and Carphia, and therefore call it Hexapolis. The name of Doris has been common to many parts of Greece. The Dorians in the age of Deucalion, inhabited Phthiotis, which they exchanged for Hiſtiæotis, in the age of Dorus. From thence they were driven by the Cadmeans, and came to ſettle near the town of Pindus. From thence they paſſed into Dryopis, and afterwards into Peloponneſus. Hercules having re-eſtabliſhed Ægimius king of Phthiotis or Doris, who had been driven from his country by the Lapithæ, the grateful king appointed Hyllus, the ſon of his patron, to be his ſucceſſor, and the Heraclidæ marched from that part of the country to go to recover Peloponneſus. The Dorians ſent many colonies into different places, which bore the ſame name as their native country. The moſt famous of theſe is Doris in Aſia Minor, of which Halicarnaſſus was once the capital. This part of Aſia Minor was called Hexapolis, and afterwards Pentapolis, after the excluſion of Halicarnaſſus. Strab 9, &c.—Apollod. 2.—Herodot. 8, c. 31.——A goddeſs of the ſea, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. Draco, a celebrated lawgiver of Athens. When he exercised the office of archon, he made a code of laws, B. C. 623, for the use of the citizens, which, on account of their severity, were said to be written in letters of blood. By them, idleness was punished with as much severity as murder, and death was denounced against the one as well as the other. Such a code of rigorous laws gave occasion to a certain Athenian to ask of the legislator, why he was so severe in his punishments, and Draco gave for answer, that as the smallest transgression had appeared to him deserving death, he could not find any punishment more rigorous for more atrocious crimes. These laws were at first enforced, but they were often neglected on account of their extreme severity, and Solon totally abolished them, except that one which punished a murderer with death. The popularity of Draco was uncommon, but the gratitude of his admirers proved fatal to him. When once he appeared on the theatre, he was received with repeated applause, and the people, according to the custom of the Athenians, showed their respect to their lawgiver, by throwing garments upon him. This was done in such profusion, that Draco was soon hid under them, and smothered by the top great veneration of his citizens. Plut. in Sol. — A man who instructed Plato in music. Id. de Music.

Dracus, a general of the Achæans, conquered by Mummius.

Drugeri, a people of Thrace. Plin. 4, c. 11.

Druĭdæ, the ministers of religion among the antient Gauls and Britons. They were divided into different classes, called the Bardi, Eubages, the Vates, the Semnothei, the Sarronides, and the Samothei. They were held in the greatest veneration by the people. Their life was austere and recluse from the world, their dress was peculiar to themselves, and they generally appeared with a tunic which reached a little below the knee. As the chief power was lodged in their hands, they punished as they pleased, and could declare war and make peace at their option. Their power was extended not only over private families, but they could depose magistrates giſtrates and even kings, if their actions in any manner deviated from the laws of the ſtate. They had the privilege of naming the magiſtrates which annually preſided over the cities, and the kings were created only with their approbation. They were entruſted with the education of youth, and all religious ceremonies, feſtivals, and ſacrifices were under their peculiar care. They taught the doctrine of the metempſychoſis, and believed the immortality of the ſoul. They were profeſſionally acquainted with the art of magic, and from their knowledge of aſtrology, they drew omens and ſaw futurity revealed before their eyes. In their ſacrifices they often immolated human victims to their gods, a barbarous cuſtom which continued long among them, and which the Roman emperors attempted to aboliſh to little purpoſe. The power and privileges which they enjoyed were beheld with admiration by their countrymen, and as their office was open to every rank and every ſtation, there were many who daily propoſed themſelves as candidates to enter upon this important function. The rigor, however, and ſeverity of a long noviciate deterred many, and few were willing to attempt a labor which enjoined them during 15 or 20 years to load their memory with the long and tedious maxims of druidical religion. Their name is derived from the Greek word δρυς, an oak, becauſe the woods and ſolitary retreats were the places of their reſidence. Cæſ. bell G. 6, c. 13.---Plin. 16, c. 44.---Diod. 5.

Drusilla Livia, a daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, famous for her debaucheries and licentiouſneſs. She committed inceſt with her brother Caligula, who was ſo tenderly attached to her that in a dangerous illneſs he made her heireſs of all his poſſeſſions, and commanded that ſhe ſhould ſucceed him in the Roman empire. She died A. D. 38, in the 23d year of her age, and was deified by her brother Caligula, who ſurvived her for ſome time. —— A daughter of Agrippa king of Judea, &c.

Drūso, an unſkilful hiſtorian and mean uſurper, who obliged his debtors, when they could not pay him, to hear him read his compoſitions, to draw from them praiſes and flattery. Horat. 1, Sat. 3, v. 86.

Drūsus, a ſon of Tiberius and Vipſania, who made himſelf famous by his intrepidity and courage in the provinces of Illyricum and Pannonia. He was raiſed to the greateſt honors of the ſtate by his father, but a blow which he gave to Sejanus, an audacious libertine, proved his ruin. Sejanus corrupted Livia the wife of Druſus, and in conjunction with her he cauſed him to be poiſoned by an eunuch, A. D. 23.----A ſon of Germanicus and Agrippina, who enjoyed offices of the greateſt truſt under Tiberius. ELAPHIÆA, a surname of Diana in Elis. Id. 6, c. 22.

ELĀPHUS, a river of Arcadia. Id. 8, c. 36.

ELAPHEBŎLIA, a festival in honor of Diana the Huntress. In the celebration a cake was made in the form of a deer, ἔλαφος, and offered to the goddess. It owed its institution to the following circumstance; when the Phocians had been severely beaten by the Thessalians, they resolved by the persuasion of a certain Delphantus, to raise a pile of combustible materials, and burn their wives, children, and effects, rather than submit to the enemy. This resolution was unanimously approved by the women, who decreed Delphantus a crown for his magnanimty. When every thing was prepared, before they fired the pile, they engaged their enemies and fought with such desperate fury, that they totally routed them, and obtained a complete victory. In commemoration of this unexpected success this festival was instituted to Diana, and observed with the greatest solemnity.

ELAPTONIUS, a youth who conspired against Alexander. Curt. 8, c. 6.

ELEUS, a city of Thrace. — A river of Media. — A king of Elis. — Pauſ. 5, c. 3.

ELEUCHIA, a daughter of Theſpius. Apollod.

ELEUSINIA, a great feſtival obſerved every fourth year by the Celeans, Phliaſians, as alſo by the Phenicatæ, Lacedæmonians, Parrhaſians and Cretans; but more particularly by the people of Athens, every fifth year, at Eleuſis in Attica, where it was introduced by Eumolpus, B. C. 1356. It was the moſt celebrated of all the religious ceremonies of Greece, whence it is often called by way of eminence, μυστηρια, the myſteries. It was ſo ſuperſtitiouſly obſerved, that if any one ever revealed it, it was ſuppoſed that he had called divine vengeance upon his head, and it was unſafe to live in the ſame houſe with him. Such a wretch was publicly put to an ignominious death. This feſtival was ſacred to Ceres and Proſerpine, every thing contained a myſtery, and Ceres herſelf was known only by the name of αχθεια, from the ſorrow and grief (αχθος) which ſhe ſuffered for the loſs of her daughter. This myſterious ſecrecy was ſolemnly obſerved, and enjoined to all the votaries of the goddeſs; and if any one ever appeared at the celebration, either intentionally, or through ignorance, without proper introduction, he was immediately puniſhed with death. Perſons of both ſexes and all ages were initiated at this ſolemnity, and it was looked upon as ſo heinous a crime to neglect this ſacred part of religion, that it was one of the heavieſt accuſations which contributed to the condemnation of Socrates. The initiated were under the more particular care of the deities, and therefore their life was ſuppoſed to be attended with more happineſs, and real ſecurity than other men. This benefit was not only granted during life, but it extended beyond the grave, and they were honored with the firſt places in the Elyſian fields, while others were left to wallow in perpetual filth and ignominy. As the benefits of expiation were ſo extenſive, particular care was taken in examining the character of ſuch as were preſented for initiation. Such as were guilty of murder, though againſt their will, and ſuch as were convicted of witchcraft, or any heinous crime, were not admitted, and the Athenians ſuffered none to be initiated but ſuch as were members of their city. This regulation, which compelled Hercules, Caſtor, and Pollux, to become citizens of Athens, was ſtrictly obſerved in the firſt ages of the inſtitution, but afterwards all perſons, barbarians excepted, were freely initiated. The feſtivals were divided into great and leſs myſteries. The leſs were inſtituted from the following circumſtance. Hercules paſſed near Eleuſis while the Athenians were celebrating the myſteries, and deſired to be initiated. As this could not be done, becauſe he was a ſtranger; and as Eumolpus was unwilling to diſpleaſe him on account of his great power, and the ſervices which he had done to the Athenians, another feſtival was inſtituted without violating the laws. It was called μικρα, and Hercules was ſolemnly admitted to the celebration and initiated. Theſe leſs myſteries were obſerved at Agræ near the Iliſſus. The greater were celebrated at Eleuſis, from which place Ceres has been called Eleuſinia. In later times the ſmaller feſtivals were preparatory to the greater, and no perſon could be initiated at Eleuſis without a previous purification at Agræ. This purification they performed by keeping themſelves pure, chaſte, and unpolluted during nine days, after which they came and offered ſacrifices and prayers, wearing garlands of flowers, called ισμερα, or ιμερα, and having under their feet Διος χωδιον, Jupiter's ſkin, which was the ſkin of a victim offered to that god. The perſon who aſſiſted was called υδρανος from υδωρ, water, which was uſed at the purification, and they themſelves were called μυστα, the initiated. A year after the initiation at the leſs myſteries they ſacrificed a ſow to Ceres, and were admitted in the greater, and the ſecrets of the feſtivals were ſolemnly revealed to them, from which they were called ϕορoι and επoπται inſpectors. The inſtitution was performed in the following manner. The candidates, crowned with myrtle, were admitted by night into a place called μυϛικος σηκος, the myſtical temple, a vaſt and ſtupendous building. As they entered the temple, they purified themſelves by waſhing their hands in holy water, and received for admonition that they were to come with a mind pure and undefiled, without which the cleanneſs of the body would be unacceptable. After this the holy myſories were read to them, from a large book called πιτρωμα, becauſe made of two ſtones, πετραι, fitly cemented together. After this the prieſt, called Ιεροφαντης, propoſed them certain queſtions, to which they readily anſwered. After this, ſtrange and amazing objects preſented themſelves to their ſight, the place often ſeemed to quake, and to appear ſuddenly reſplendent with fire, and immediately covered with gloomy darkneſs and horror. Sometimes thunders were heard, or flaſhes of lightning appeared on every ſide. At other times hideous noiſes and howlings were heard, and the trembling ſpectators were alarmed by ſudden and dreadful apparitions. This was called αυτοψια, intuition. After this the initiated were diſmiſſed with the barbarous words of ευγε, ομπαξ. The garments in which they were initiated, were held ſacred, and of no leſs efficacy to avert evils than charms and incantations. From this circumſtance therefore they were never left off before they were totally unfit for wear, after which they were appropriated for children, or dedicated to the goddeſs. The chief perſon that attended at the initiation was called Ιεροφαντης, the revealer of ſacred things. He was a citizen of Athens, and held his office during life, though among the Celeans and Phliaſians it was limited to the period of four years. He was obliged to devote himſelf totally to the ſervice of the deities; his life was chaſte and ſingle, and he uſually anointed his body with the juice of hemlock, which is ſaid, by its extreme coldneſs, to extinguiſh in a great degree the natural heat. The Hierophantes had three attendants; the firſt was called δαδουχος, torch-bearer, and was permitted to marry. The ſecond was called κηρυξ, a cryer. The third adminiſtered at the altar, and was called ο επι βωμῳ. The Hierophantes is ſaid to have been a type of the powerful Creator of all things, δαδουχος of the ſun, Κηρυξ of Mercury, and ο επι βωμῳ of the moon. There were beſides theſe other inferior officers who took particular care that every thing was performed according to cuſtom. The firſt of theſe, called βασιλευς, was one of the Archons; he offered prayers and ſacrifices, and took care that there was no indecency or irregularity during the celebration. Beſides him there were four others called επιμεληται, curators, elected by the people. One of them was choſen from the ſacred family of the Eumolpidæ, the other was one of the Ceryces, and the reſt were from among the citizens. There were alſo ten perſons who aſſiſted at this and every other feſtival, called αρρητοι, becauſe they offered ſacrifices.—This feſtival was obſerved in the month Boedromion or September, and continued nine days from the 15th till the 23d. During that time it was unlawful to arreſt any man, or preſent any petition on pain of forfeiting a thouſand drachmas, or, according to others, on pain of death. It was alſo unlawful for thoſe who were initiated to ſit upon the cover of a well, to eat beans, mullets, or weazels. If any woman rode to Eleuſis in a chariot, ſhe was obliged by an edict of Lycurgus to pay 6,000 drachmas. The deſign of this law was to deſtroy all diſtinction between the richer and poorer ſort of citizens.—The firſt day of the celebration was called αγορμος, aſſembly, as it might be ſaid that the worſhippers firſt met together. The ſecond day was called αλα δι μυσαι, to the ſea, you that are initiated, becauſe they were commanded to purify themſelves by bathing in the ſea. On the third day ſacrifices, and chiefly a mullet, were offered; as alſo barley from a field of Eleuſis. Theſe oblations were called θυα, and held ſo ſacred that the prieſts themſelves were not, as in other ſacrifices, permitted to partake of them. On the fourth day they made a ſolemn proceſſion, in which the καλαθιον, holy baſket of Ceres, was carried about in a conſecrated cart, while on every ſide the people ſhouted, χαιρε Δημητερ, Hail Ceres! After theſe followed women, called κιſοφοροι, who carried baſkets, in which were ſeſamun, carded wool, grains of ſalt, a ſerpent, pomegranates, reeds, ivy boughs, certain cakes, &c. The fifth was called Η των λαμπαδων ημερα, the torch day, becauſe on the following night the people ran about with torches in their hands. It was uſual to dedicate torches to Ceres, and contend which ſhould offer the biggeſt in commemoration of the travels of the goddeſs, and of her lighting a torch in the flames of mount Ætna. The ſixth day was called Ιακχος, from Iacchus, the ſon of Jupiter and Ceres, who accompanied his mother in her ſearch after Proſerpine with a torch in his hand. From that circumſtance his ſtatue had a torch in its hand, and was carried in ſolemn proceſſion from the Ceramicus to Eleuſis. The ſtatue, with thoſe that accompanied it, called Ιακχαγωγοι, were crowned with myrtle. In the way, nothing was heard but ſinging and the noiſe of brazen kettles, as the votaries danced along. The way through which they iſſued from the city was called Ιερα οδος, the ſacred way; the reſting place, Ιερα συκη, from a fig-tree which grew in the neighbourhood. They alſo ſtopped on a bridge over the Cephiſus, where they derided thoſe that paſſed by. After they had paſſed this bridge, they entered Eleuſis by a place called μυσικη εισοδος, the myſtical entrance. On the ſeventh day were ſports, in which the victors were rewarded with a meaſure of barley, as that grain had been first sown in Eleusis. The eighth day was called Επιδαυριων ημερα, because once Æsculapius, at his return from Epidaurus to Athens, was initiated by the repetition of the less mysteries. It became customary, therefore, to celebrate them a second time upon this, that such as had not hitherto been initiated might be lawfully admitted. The 9th and last day of the festival was called πλημοχοαι, earthen vessels, because it was usual to fill two such vessels with wine, one of which being placed towards the east, and the other towards the west, which, after the repetition of some mystical words were both thrown down, and the wine being spilt on the ground was offered as a libation. Such was the manner of celebrating the Eleusinian mysteries, which have been deemed the most sacred and solemn of all the festivals observed by the Greeks. Some have supposed them to be obscene and abominable, and that from thence proceeded all the mysterious secrecy. They were carried from Eleusis to Rome in the reign of Adrian, where they were observed with the same ceremonies as before, though perhaps with more freedom and licentiousness. They lasted about 1800 years, and were at last abolished by Theodosius the Great. Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 24.—Cic. de Leg. 2, c. 14.—Paus. 10, c. 31, &c.—Plut.

ELEUSIS, a town of Attica, equally distant from Megara and the Piræus, celebrated for the festivals of Ceres. (Vid. Eleusini.) Ovid. 4. Fast. v. 507. Paus. 9, c. 24.

ELEUTHER, a son of Apollo.

ELEUTHĔRÆ, a village of Bœotia, where Mardonius was defeated with 300,000 men.

ELEUTHĔRIA, a festival celebrated at Platæa in honor of Jupiter Eleutherius, or the assertor of liberty, by delegates from almost all the cities of Greece. Its institution originated in this; after the victory obtained by the Grecians under Pausanias over Mardonius the Persian general in the country of Platæa, an altar and statue were erected to Jupiter Eleutherius, who had freed the Greeks from the tyranny of the barbarians. It was further agreed upon in a general assembly, by the advice of Aristides the Athenian, that deputies should be sent every fifth year from the different cities of Greece to celebrate Eleutheria festivals of liberty. The Platæans celebrated also an anniversary festival in memory of those who had lost their lives in that famous battle. The celebration was thus: At break of day a procession was made with a trumpeter at the head, sounding a signal for battle. After him followed chariots loaded with myrrh, garlands, and a black bull, and certain free young men, as no signs of servility were to appear during the solemnity, because they in whose honor the festival was instituted had died in the defence of their country. They carried libations of wine and milk in large eared vessels, with jars of oil and precious ointments. Last of all appeared the chief magistrate, who though not permitted at other times to touch iron, or wear garments of any color but white, yet appeared clad in purple; and taking a water pot out of the city chamber, proceeded through the middle of the town with a sword in his hand, towards the sepulchres. There he drew water from a neighbouring spring, and washed and anointed the monuments; after which he sacrificed a bull upon a pile of wood, invoking Jupiter and infernal Mercury, and inviting to the entertainment the souls of those happy heroes who had perished in the defence of their country. After this he filled a bowl with wine, saying, I drink to those who lost their lives in the defence of the liberties of Greece. There was also a festival of the same name observed by the Samians in honor of the god of Love. Slaves also, when they obtained their liberty, kept a holiday, which they called Eleutheria.

ELEUTHO, a firname of Juno Lucina. Pindar.

ELEUTHEROCILĬCES, a people of Asia. Cic. 15, ad fam. ep. 4. l. 5, ad. Att. 20.

ELĬCIUS, a firname of Jupiter, worshipped on mount Aventine. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 328.

ELIENSIS & ELIĂCA, a sect of philosophers founded by Phædon of Elis, who was originally a slave. Diog.—Strab.

ELIMĔA, a town of Macedonia.

ELIS, a country of Peloponnesus at the west of Arcadia, and north of Messenia. It runs along the coast, and is watered by the river Alpheus. The capital of the country is called Elis. It was originally governed by kings, and received its name from Elus, one of its monarchs. Elis was famous for the horses it produced, whose celerity was so often known and tried at the Olympic games. Virg. G. i. v. 59.—Strab. 8.—Plin. 4, c. 5.—Paus. 5.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 494.

ELISPHASII, a people of Peloponnesus. Polyb. 11.

ELISSA, a queen of Tyre more commonly known by the name of Dido. Vid. Dido.

ELLOPIA, a town of Eubœa.—An ancient name of that island.

ELISSUS, a river of Elis.

ELŌRUS, a river of Sicily on the eastern coasts called after a king of the same name. Herodot. 7, c. 145.

ELOS, a city of Achaia, called after a servant maid of Athamas of the same name.

ELOTÆ. Vid. Helotæ.

ELPĔNOR, one of the companions of Ulysses, lysses, changed into a hog by Circe's potions, and afterwards restored to his former shape. He fell from the top of a house where he was sleeping, and was killed. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 252.—Homer. Od. 10.

ELPINICE, a daughter of Miltiades, who married a man that promised to release from confinement her brother and husband, whom the laws of Athens had made responsible for the fine imposed on his father. C. Nep. in Cim.

ELUINA, a surname of Ceres.

ELYCES, a man killed by Perseus. Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 3.

ELYMAIS, a country of Persia, between the Persian gulf and Media. The capital of the country was called Elymais, and was famous for a rich temple of Diana, which Antiochus Epiphanes attempted to plunder. The Elymeans assisted Antiochus the Great in his wars against the Romans. None of their kings are named in history. Strabo.

ELYMI, a nation descended from the Trojans, in alliance with the people of Carthage. Paus. 10, c. 8.

ELYMUS, a man at the court of Acestes in Sicily. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 73.

ELYRUS, a town of Crete. Id. 10, c. 16.

ELYSIUM, & ELYSII CAMPI, a place or island in the infernal regions, where, according to the mythology of the antients, the souls of the virtuous were placed after death. There happiness is complete, the pleasures are innocent and refined. Bowers for ever green, delightful meadows with pleasant streams, are the most striking objects. The air is wholesome, serene and temperate; the birds continually warble in the groves, and the inhabitants are blessed with another sun and other stars. The employment of the heroes who dwell in these regions of bliss are various; the manes of Achilles are represented as waging war with the wild beasts, while the Trojan chiefs are innocently exercising themselves in managing horses, or in handling arms. To these innocent amusements some poets have added continual feasting and revelry, and they suppose that the Elysian fields were filled with all the incontinence and voluptuousness which could gratify the low desires of the debauchee. The Elysian fields were, according to some, in the fortunate islands on the coast of Africa, in the Atlantic. Others place them in the island of Leuce; and, according to the authority of Virgil, they were situate in Italy. According to Lucian, they were near the moon; or in the centre of the earth if we believe Plutarch. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 638.—Homer. Od. 4.—Pindar.—Tibull. 1, el. 3, v. 57.—Lucian.—Plut. de Consol.

EMATHIA, a name given anciently and particularly by the poets to the countries which formed the empires of Macedonia and Thessaly. Virg. G. 1, v. 492.—Lucan. 1, v. 1.

EMATHION, a son of Titan and Aurora, who reigned in Macedonia. The country was called Emathia from his name. Some suppose that he was a famous robber destroyed by Hercules. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 313. Justin. 7, c. 1. —— A man killed at the nuptials of Perseus and Andromeda. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 100.

EMATHON, a man killed in the wars of Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 571.

EMBATUM, a place of Asia, opposite Chios.

EMBOLIMA, a town of India. Curt. 8, c. 12.

EMERITA, a town of Spain.

EMESSA & EMISSA, a town of Phœnicia.

EMODA, a mountain of India.

EMPEDOCLES, a philosopher, poet, and historian of Agrigentum in Sicily, who florished 444 B. C. He was the disciple of Telauges the Pythagorean, and warmly adopted the doctrine of transmigration. He wrote a poem upon the opinions of Pythagoras, very much commended, in which he spoke of the various bodies which nature had given him. He was first a girl, afterwards a boy, a shrub, a bird, a fish, and lastly Empedocles. His poetry was bold and animated, and his verses were so universally esteemed, that they were publicly recited at the Olympic games with those of Homer and Hesiod. He was no less remarkable for his humanity and social virtues than for his learning. He shewed himself an inveterate enemy to tyranny, and refused to become the sovereign of his country. He taught rhetoric in Sicily, and often alleviated the anxieties of his mind as well as the pains of his body with music. It is reported that his curiosity to visit the flames of the crater of Ætna, proved fatal to him. Some maintain that he wished it to be believed that he was a god, and that his death might be unknown, he threw himself into the crater and perished in the flames. His expectations, however, were frustrated, and the volcano by throwing up one of his sandals, discovered to the world that Empedocles had perished by fire. Others report that he lived to an extreme old age, and that he was drowned in the sea. Horat. 1, ep. 12, v. 20, —Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 50, &c. —Diog. in vitâ.

EMPERAMUS, a Lacedemonian general in the second Messenian war.

EMPOCLUS, an historian.

EMPORIA PUNICA, certain places near the Syrtes.

ENCELADUS, a son of Titan and Terra, the most powerful of all the giants who con-ſpired againſt Jupiter. He was ſtruck with Jupiter's thunders, and overwhelmed under mount Ætna. Some ſuppoſe that he is the ſame as Typhon. According to the poets, the flames of Ætna proceeded from the breath of Enceladus; and as often as he turned his weary ſide, the whole iſland of Sicily felt the motion, and ſhook from its very foundations. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 578, &c.—— A ſon of Ægyptus.

ENCHĔLEÆ, a town of Illyricum, where Cadmus was changed into a ſerpent. Lucan. 3, v. 189.

ENDEIS, a nymph, daughter of Chiron. She married Æacus, king of Ægina, by whom ſhe had Peleus and Telamon. Pauſ. 2, c. 29.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.

ENDĔRA, a place of Æthiopia.

ENDŸMION, a ſhepherd, ſon of Æthlius and Calyce. It is ſaid that he required of Jupiter to grant to him to be always young, and to ſleep as much as he would; whence came the proverb of Endymionis ſomnum dormire, to expreſs a long ſleep. Diana ſaw him naked as he ſlept on mount Latmos, and was ſo ſtruck with his beauty that ſhe came down from heaven every night to enjoy his company. Endymion married Chromia, daughter of Itonus, by whom he had three ſons, Pæon, Epeus and Æolus, and a daughter called Eurydice. The fable of Endymion's amours with Diana, or the moon, ariſes from his knowledge of aſtronomy, and as he paſſed the night on ſome high mountain, to obſerve the heavenly bodies, it has been reported that he was courted by the moon. Some ſuppoſe that there were two of that name, the ſon of a king of Elis, and the ſhepherd or aſtronomer of Caria. The people of Heraclea maintained that Endymion died on mount Latmos, and the Eleans pretended to ſhow his tomb at Olympia in Peloponneſus. Propert. 2, el. 15.—Cic. Tuſc. 1.—Juv. 10.—Theocrit. 3.—Pauſ. 5, c. 1, l. 6, c. 20.

ENĒTI, a people near Paphlagonia.

ENGŸUM, a town of Sicily freed from tyranny by Timoleon. Ital. 14, v. 250.

ENIENSES, a people of Greece.

ENIOPEUS, a charioteer of Hector killed by Diomedes. Homer. Il. 8, v. 120.

ENĪPEUS, a river of Theſſaly flowing near Pharſalia. Lucan. 6, v. 373.—— A river of Elis in Peloponneſus. Strab.

ENISPE, a town of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 25.

ENNA, a town in the middle of Sicily, with a beautiful plain, where Proſerpine was carried away by Pluto. Mela. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 522.

ENNIA, a wife of Caligula, &c. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 45.

Q. ENNIUS, an antient poet born at Rudii in Calabria. He obtained the name and privileges of a Roman citizen by his genius and the brilliancy of his learning. His ſtile is rough and unpoliſhed, but his defects, which are more particularly attributed to the age in which he lived, have been fully compenſated by the energy of his expreſſions and the fire of his poetry. Quintilian warmly commends him, and Virgil has ſhown his merit by introducing many whole lines from the poetry of Ennius into his own compoſitions, which he called pearls gathered from the dunghill. Ennius wrote in heroic verſe the annals of the Roman republic, and diſplayed much knowledge of the world in ſome dramatical and ſatyrical compoſitions. He died of the gout, contracted by his frequent intoxication, about 169 years before the Chriſtian era, in the 70th year of his age. Ennius was intimate with the great men of his age; he accompanied Cato in his quæſtorſhip in Sardinia, and was eſteemed by him of greater value than the honors of a triumph; and Scipio on his death-bed, ordered his body to be buried by the ſide of his poetical friend. This epitaph was ſaid to be written upon him:

Aſpicite, o cives, ſenis Ennii imaginis formam!
Hic veſtrum pinxit maxima facta patrum.
Nemo me lacrymis decoret, neque funera ſtent;
Faxit: cur? volito vivus per ora virûm.

Conſcious of his merit as the firſt Epic poet of Rome, Ennius beſtowed on himſelf the appellation of the Homer of Latium. Of the tragedies, comedies, annals, and ſatires which he wrote, nothing remains but fragments happily collected from the quotations of antient authors. The beſt edition of theſe is by Heſſelius, 4to. Amſt. 1707. Ovid. 2, Triſt. v. 424.—Cic. de Finib. 1, c. 4, de Offic. 2, c. 18.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Lucret. 1, v. 117, &c.—C. Nep. in Catone.

ENNOSIGÆUS, a ſirname of Neptune, terræ concuſſor.

ENŎPE, a town of Peloponneſus, near Pylos. Pauſ. 3, c. 26.

ENOPS, a ſhepherd loved by the nymph Neis, by whom he had Satnius. Homer. Il. 14.——The father of Theſtor.——A Trojan killed by Patroclus. Il. 16.

ENOS, a maritime town of Thrace.

ENOSICHTHON, a ſirname of Neptune.

ENOTŎCŒTÆ, a nation whoſe ears hang down to their heels. Strab.

ENTELLA, a town of Sicily inhabited by Campanians. Ital. 14, v. 205.

ENTELLUS, a famous athlete among the friends of Æneas. He was intimate with Eryx, and entered the liſts againſt Dares in the the funeral games of Anchiſes, in Sicily. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 387, &c.

ENYALIUS, a ſirname of Mars.

ENYO, a ſiſter of Mars, called by the Latins Bellona.——A daughter of Phorcis.

EONE, a daughter of Theſpius. Apollod.

EOS, the name of Aurora among the Greeks, whence the eaſtern parts of the world are called Eoo.

EOUS, one of the horſes of the ſun. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 153, &c.

EPAGRI, one of the Cyclades, called by Ariſtotle Hydruſſa. Plin. 4, c. 12.

EPAMINONDAS, a famous Theban deſcended from the antient kings of Bœotia. His father's name was Polymnus. He has been celebrated for his private virtues and military accompliſhments. His love of truth was ſo great that he never diſgraced himſelf by a falſehood. He formed a moſt ſacred and inviolable friendſhip with Pelopidas, whoſe life he ſaved in a battle. By his advice Pelopidas delivered Thebes from the power of Lacedæmon. This was the ſignal of war. Epaminondas was ſet at the head of the Theban armies, and defeated the Spartans at the celebrated battle of Leuctra, about 371 years B. C. Epaminondas made a proper uſe of this victorious campaign, and entered the territories of Lacedæmon with 50,000 men. Here he gained many friends and partizans; but at his return to Thebes he was ſeized as a traitor for violating the laws of his country. While he was making the Theban arms victorious on every ſide, he neglected the law which forbad any citizen to retain in his hands the ſupreme power more than one month, and all his eminent ſervices ſeemed unable to redeem him from death. He paid implicit obedience to the laws of his country, and only begged of his judges that it might be inſcribed on his tomb that he had ſuffered death for ſaving his country from ruin. This animated reproach was felt; he was pardoned, and inveſted again with the ſovereign power. He was ſucceſsful in a war in Theſſaly, and aſſiſted the Eleans againſt the Lacedæmonians. The hoſtile armies met near Mantinea, and while Epaminondas was bravely fighting in the thickeſt of the enemy, he received a fatal wound in the breaſt, and expired exclaiming, that he died unconquered, when he heard that the Bœotians obtained the victory, in the 48th year of his age, 363 years before Chriſt. The Thebans ſeverely lamented his death; in him their power was extinguiſhed, for only during his life they had enjoyed freedom and independence among the Grecian ſtates. Epaminondas was frugal as well as virtuous; he refuſed with indignation the rich preſents which were offered to him by Artaxerxes the king of Perſia. He is repreſented by his biographer as an elegant dancer and a ſkilful muſician, accompliſhments highly eſteemed among his countrymen.—Plut. in Parall.—C. Nep. in vitâ.—*Xenoph. Queſt. EPANTELII, a people of Italy.

EPAPHRODITUS, a freed man puniſhed with death for aſſiſting Nero to deſtroy himſelf. Suet. in Ner.——A freed man of Auguſtus ſent to ſpy Cleopatra. Plut.——A name aſſumed by Sylla.

EPAPHUS, a ſon of Jupiter and Io, who founded a city in Egypt, which he called Memphis, in honor of his wife, who was the daughter of the Nile. He had a daughter called Libya. He was worſhipped as a god at Memphis. Herodot. 2, c. 153.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 699, &c.

EPASNACTUS, a Gaul in alliance with Rome, &c. Cæſ. Bell. G. 8, c. 44.

EPEBOLUS, a ſoothſayer of Meſſenia, who prevented Ariſtodemus from obtaining the ſovereignty. Pauſ. 4, c. 9, &c.

EPEI & ELEI, a people of Peloponneſus. Plin. 4, c. 5.

EPEUS, a ſon of Endymion, brother to Pæon, who reigned in a part of Peloponneſus. His ſubjects were called from him Epei. Pauſ. 5, c. 1.——A ſon of Panopeus, who was the fabricator of the famous wooden horſe which proved the ruin of Troy. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 264.—Juſtin. 20, c. 2.—Pauſ. 10, c. 26.

EPHESUS, a city of Ionia, built, as Juſtin mentions, by the Amazons; or by Androchus, ſon of Codrus, according to Strabo; or by Epheſus, a ſon of the river Cayſter. It is famous for a temple of Diana, which was reckoned one of the ſeven wonders of the world. This temple was 425 feet long and 200 feet broad. The roof was ſupported by 127 columns ſixty feet high, which had been placed there by ſo many kings. Of theſe columns, 36 were carved in the moſt beautiful manner, one of which was the work of the famous Scopas. This celebrated building was not totally completed till 220 years after its foundation. Cteſiphon was the chief architect. There was above the entrance a huge ſtone, which, according to Pliny, had been placed there by Diana herſelf. The riches which were in the temple were immenſe, and the goddeſs who preſided over it was worſhipped with the moſt awful ſolemnity. This celebrated temple was burnt on the night that Alexander was born, [Vid. Eroſtratus] and ſoon after it roſe from its ruins with more ſplendor and magnificence. Alexander offered to rebuild it at his own expence, if the Epheſians would place upon it an inſcription which denoted the name of the benefactor. This generous offer was refuſed by the Epheſians, who obſerved, ſerved, in the language of adulation, that it was improper that one deity ſhould raiſe temples to the other. Lyſimachus ordered the town of Epheſus to be called Arſinoe, in honor of his wife; but after his death the new appellation was loſt, and the town was again known by its antient name. Though modern authors are not agreed about the antient ruins of this once famed city, ſome have given the barbarous name of Ajaſaluc to what they conjecture to be the remains of Epheſus. Strab. 12 & 14.—Mela 1, c. 17. Pauſ. 7, c. 2. —Plut. in Alex. —Juſtin 2, c. 4. —Plin. 29 & 36. —Callim in Dian.—Ptol. 5.—*Cic. de Nat. Ephĕtæ, a number of magiſtrates at Athens firſt inſtituted by Demophoon, the ſon of Theſeus. They were reduced to the number of 51 by Draco, who, according to ſome, firſt eſtabliſhed them. They were ſuperior to the Areopagites, and their privileges were great and numerous. Solon, however, leſſened their power, and entruſted them only with the trial of manſlaughter and conſpiracy againſt the life of a citizen. They were all more than fifty years old, and it was required that their manners ſhould be pure and innocent, and their behaviour auſtere and full of gravity.

Ephialtes or Ephialtus, a giant, ſon of Neptune, who grew nine inches every month. [Vid. Aloeus.] —— An Athenian famous for his courage and ſtrength. He fought with the Perſians againſt Alexander, and was killed at Halicarnaſſus. Diod. 17. ——A Trachinian who led a detachment of the army of Xerxes by a ſecret path to attack the Spartans at Thermopylæ. Pauſ. 1, c. 4.—Herodot. 7, c. 213.

Ephŏri, powerful magiſtrates at Sparta, who were firſt created by Lycurgus; or, according to ſome, by Theopompus, B. C. 760: They were five in number. Like cenſors in the ſtate, they could check and reſtrain the authority of the kings, and even impriſon them, if guilty of irregularities. They fined Archidamus for marrying a wife of ſmall ſtature, and impriſoned Agis for his unconſtitutional behaviour. They were much the ſame as the tribunes of the people at Rome, created to watch with a jealous eye over the liberties and rights of the populace. They had the management of the public money, and were the arbiters of peace and war. Their office was annual, and they had the privilege of convening, proroguing, and diſſolving the greater and leſs aſſemblies of the people. The former was compoſed of 9000 Spartans, all inhabitants of the city; the latter of 30,000 Lacedæmonians, inhabitants of the inferior towns and villages.

Ephŏrus, an orator and hiſtorian of Cumæ in Æolia, about 352 years before Chriſt. He was diſciple to Iſocrates, by whoſe advice he wrote an hiſtory which gave an account of all the actions and battles that had happened between the Greeks and barbarians for 750 years. It was greatly eſteemed by the antients. It is now loſt. Quintil. 10, c. 1.

Epicaste, a name of Jocaſta the mother and wife of Œdipus. Pauſ. 9, c. 5.

Epicerides, a man of Cyrene, greatly eſteemed by the Athenians for his beneficence. Demoſt.

Epicharis, a woman accuſed of conſpiracy againſt Nero. She refuſed to confeſs the aſſociates of her guilt, though expoſed to the greateſt torments, &c. Tacit. 15, Ann. c. 51.

Epicharmus, a poet and Pythagorean philoſopher of Sicily, who introduced comedy at Syracuſe, in the reign of Hiero. His compoſitions were imitated by Plautus. He wrote ſome treatiſes upon philoſophy and medicine, and obſerved that the gods ſold all their kindneſſes for toil and labor. According to Ariſtotle and Pliny, he added the two leters χ and θ to the Greek alphabet. He floriſhed about 440 years before Chriſt, and died in the 90th year of his age. Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 58.—Diog. 3 & 8.—Cic. ad Attic. 1, ep. 19.

Epicles, a Trojan prince killed by Ajax. Homer. Il. 12.

Epiclides, a Lacedæmonian of the family of the Euryſthenidæ. He was raiſed to the throne by his brother Cleomenes 3d, in the place of Agis, againſt the laws and conſtitution of Sparta. Pauſ. 2, c. 9.

Epicrates, a Mileſian, ſervant to J. Cæſar—A poet of Ambracia. Ælian.

Epictetus, a Stoic philoſopher of Hierapolis in Phrygia, originally the ſlave of Epaphroditus, the freedman of Nero. Tho' driven from Rome by Domitian, he returned after the emperor's death, and gained the eſteem of Adrian and Marcus Aurelius. Like the Stoics, he ſupported the doctrine of the immortality of the ſoul, but he declared himſelf ſtrongly againſt ſuicide, which was ſo warmly adopted by his ſect. He died in a very advanced age. The earthen lamp of which he made uſe, was ſold ſome time after his death at 3000 drachmas. His Enchiridion is a faithful picture of the Stoic philoſophy; and his diſſertations, which were delivered to his pupils, were collected by Arrian. His ſtile is conciſe and devoid of all ornament, full of energy and uſeful maxims.

The

The value of this book is well known from the saying of the emperor Antoninus, who thanked the gods he could collect from the writings of Epictetus wherewith to conduct life with honor to himself and advantage to his country. There are several good editions of the works of Epictetus, with those of Cebes and others; the most valuable of which, perhaps, will be found to be that of Reland, Traject. 4to. 1711; and Arrian's by Upton, 2 vols. 4to. Lond. 1739.

Epicurus, a celebrated philosopher born at Gargetium in Attica of obscure parents. He was early sent to school, where he distinguished himself by the brilliancy of his genius, and at the age of 12, when his preceptor repeated him this verse from Hesiod, Ητοι μεν πρωτιστα χαος γενετ', &c.

In the beginning of things the Chaos was created.

Epicurus earnestly asked him who created it? To this the teacher answered, that he knew not, but only philosophers. "Then," says the youth, "philosophers henceforth shall instruct me." After having improved himself, and enriched his mind by travelling, he visited Athens, which was then crowded by the followers of Plato, the Cynics, the Peripatetics, and the Stoics. Here he established himself, and soon attracted a number of followers by the sweetness and gravity of his manners, and by his social virtues. He taught them that the happiness of mankind consisted in pleasure, not such as arises from sensual gratification, or from vice, but from the enjoyments of the mind, and the sweets of virtue. This doctrine was warmly attacked by the philosophers of the different sects, and particularly by the Stoics. They observed that he disgraced the gods by representing them as inactive, given up to pleasure, and unconcerned with the affairs of mankind. He refuted all the accusations of his adversaries by the purity of his morals, and by his frequent attendance on places of public worship. When Leontium, one of his female pupils, was accused of prostituting herself to her master and to all his disciples, the philosopher proved the falsity of the accusation by silence and an exemplary life. His health was at last impaired by continual labor, and he died of a retention of urine, which long subjected him to the most excruciating torments, and which he bore with unparalleled fortitude. His death happened 270 years before Christ, in the 72d year of his age. His disciples showed their respect for the memory of their learned preceptor, by the unanimity which prevailed among them. While philosophers in every sect were at war with mankind and among themselves, the followers of Epicurus enjoyed perfect peace, and lived in the most solid friendship. The day of his birth was observed with universal festivity, and during a month all his admirers gave themselves up to mirth and innocent amusement. Of all the philosophers of antiquity, Epicurus is the only one whose writings deserve attention for their number. He wrote no less than 300 volumes, according to Diogenes Laertius; and Chrysippus was so jealous of the fecundity of his genius, that no sooner had Epicurus published one of his volumes, but he immediately composed one, that he might not be overcome in the number of his productions. Epicurus, however, advanced truths and arguments unknown before; but Chrysippus said, what others long ago had said, without showing any thing which might be called originality. The followers of Epicurus were numerous in every age and country. This corrupted the virtuous simplicity of the Romans; and when Cyneas spoke of the doctrines of the Epicureans in the Roman senate, Fabricius entreated the gods that all the enemies of the republic might become his followers. Lucretius introduced at Rome the doctrines of Epicurus in a poetical composition, and the smoothness and beauty of the poetry contributed with the effeminacy of the Epicureans, to enervate the conquerors of the world. Diog. in vitâ.—Ælian. V. H. 4, c. 13.—Cic. de Nat. D. 1, c. 24 & 25.—Tusc. 3, c. 49. de finib. 2, c. 22.

Epicydes, a tyrant of Syracuse, B.C. 213.

Epidamnus, a town of Macedonia on the Adriatic, nearly opposite Brundusium. The Romans planted there a colony which they called Dyrrachium. Paus. 6, c. 10.

Epidaphne, a town of Syria called also Antioch. Germanicus, son of Drusus, died there. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 83.

Epidauria, a festival at Athens in honor of Æsculapius.—A country of Peloponnesus.

Epidaurus, a town at the north of Argolis in Peloponnesus, chiefly dedicated to the worship of Æsculapius, who had there a famous temple. It received its name from Epidaurus, a son of Argus and Evadne. It is now called Pidaura. Strab. 8.—Paus. 3, c. 21.—Mela 2, c. 3.—A town of Dalmatia.

Epidius, a man who wrote concerning unusual prodigies. Plin. 16, c. 25.

Epidotæ, certain deities who presided over the birth of children. They were worshipped by the Lacedæmonians, and chiefly invoked by those who were persecuted by the ghosts of the dead, &c. Paus. 3, c. 17, &c.

Epigĕnes, a Babylonian aſtrologer and hiſtorian. Plin. 7, c. 56.

Epigeus, a Greek killed by Hector.

Epigŏni, the ſons and deſcendants of the Grecian heroes who were killed in the firſt Theban war. The war of the Epigoni is famous in ancient hiſtory. It was undertaken ten years after the firſt. The ſons of thoſe who had periſhed in the firſt war, reſolved to avenge the death of their fathers, and marched againſt Thebes, under the command of Therſander; or, according to others, of Alcmæon the ſon of Amphiaraus. The Argives were aſſiſted by the Corinthians, the people of Meſſenia, Arcadia, and Megara. The Thebans had engaged all their neighbours in their quarrel, as in one common cauſe. Theſe two hoſtile armies met and engaged on the banks of the Gliſſas. The fight was obſtinate and bloody, but victory declared for the Epigoni, and ſome of the Thebans fled to Illyricum with Leodamas their general, while others retired into Thebes, where they were ſoon beſieged, and forced to ſurrender. In this war Ægialeus was the only one who was killed, and his father Adraſtus was the only one who eſcaped alive in the firſt war. This whole war, as Pauſanias obſerves, was written in verſe; and Callinus, who quotes ſome of the verſes, aſcribes them to Homer, which opinion has been adopted by many writers. For my part, continues the geographer, I own that next to the Iliad and Odyſſey of Homer, I have never ſeen a finer poem. Pauſ. 9, c. 9 & 25.—Apollod. 1 & 3.—Diod. 4.

Epigŏnus, a mathematician of Ambracia.

Epĭi & Epēi, a people of Elis.

Epilaris, a daughter of Theſpius.—Apollod.

Epimĕlĭdes, the founder of Corone. Pauſ. 4, c. 34.

Epimĕnes, a man who conſpired againſt Alexander's life. Curt. 8, c. 6.

Epimenĭdes, an epic poet of Crete, contemporary with Solon. His father's name was Agiaſarchus. He is reckoned one of the ſeven wiſe men, by thoſe who exclude Periander from the number. While he was tending his flocks one day, he entered into a cave, where he fell aſleep. His ſleep continued for 57 years, according to tradition, and when he awoke he found every object ſo conſiderably altered, that he ſcarce knew where he was. His brother apprized him of the length of his ſleep to his great aſtoniſhment. It is ſuppoſed that he lived 289 years. After death he was revered as a god, and greatly honored by the Athenians, whom he had delivered from a plague, and to whom he had given many good and uſeful counſels. He is ſaid to be the firſt who built temples in the Grecian communities. Cic. de Div. 1.—Diog in vitâ.—Pauſ. 1, c. 14.—Plut. in Solon.—Val. Max. 8, c. 13.—Strab. 10.—Plin. 7. c. 12.

Epimēthеus, a ſon of Japetus and Clymene, one of the Oceanides, who inconſiderately married Pandora, by whom he had Pyrrha, the wife of Deucalion. He had the curioſity to open the box which Pandora had brought with her, [Vid Pandora] and from thence iſſued a train of evils, which from that moment have never ceaſed to afflict the human race. Hope was the only one which remained at the bottom of the box, not having ſufficient time to eſcape, and it is ſhe alone which comforts men under misfortunes. Epimetheus was changed into a monkey by the gods and ſent into the iſland Pithecuſa. Apollod. 1, c. 2 & 7.—Hygin. fab. —Heſiod. Theog. [Vid. Prometheus.] Epimēthis, a patronymic of Pyrrha, the daughter of Epimetheus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 390.

Epiŏchus, a ſon of Lycurgus, who received divine honors in Arcadia.

Epiŏne, the wife of Æſculapius. Pauſ. 2, c. 29.

Epiphănes, illuſtrious, a ſirname given to the Antiochus's, kings of Syria. —A ſirname of one of the Ptolemies, the fifth of the houſe of the Lagidæ. Strab. 17.

Epiphanius, a biſhop of Salamis, active to refute the writings of Origen; but his compoſitions are more valuable for the fragments which they preſerve than for their own intrinſic merit. The only edition is by Dionyſ. Petavius, 2 vols. Paris, 1622. The biſhop died A. D. 403.

Epīrus, a country ſituate between Macedonia, Achaia, and the Ionian ſea. It was formerly governed by kings, of whom Neoptolemus, ſon of Achilles, was one of the firſt. It was afterwards joined to the empire of Macedonia, and at laſt became a part of the Roman dominions. It is now called Larta. Strab. 7 —Mela. 2, c. 3.—Ptol. 3, c. 14.—Plin. 4, c. 1.

Epistrŏphus, a king of Phocis who went to the Trojan war. Homer. Il.

Epitades, a man who firſt violated a law of Lycurgus, which forbad laws to be made. Plut. in Agid.

Epium, a town of Peloponneſus on the borders of Arcadia.

Epŏna, a beautiful girl, the fruit of a man's union with a mare.

Epŏpeus, a ſon of Neptune and Canace, who came from Theſſaly to Sicyon, and carried away Antiope, daughter of Nycteus king of Thebes. This rape was followed by a war, in which Nycteus and Epopeus were both killed. Pauſ. 2, c. 6.—Apollod. 1, c. 7, &c.

7, &c.——A ſon of Aloeus, grandſon to Phœbus. He reigned at Corinth. Pauſ. 2, c. 1 and 3.——One of the Tyrrhene ſailors, who attempted to abuſe Bacchus. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 619.

Eporedŏrix, a powerful perſon among the Æduï, who commanded his countrymen in their war againſt the Sequani. Cæſ. Bell. G. 7, c. 67.

Epŭlo, a Rutulian killed by Achates. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 459.

Epytides, a patronymic given to Periphantes, the ſon of Epytus and the companion of Aſcanius. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 547.

Epўtus, a king of Alba. Ovid Faſt. 4, v. 44.——A king of Arcadia.——A king of Meſſenia, of the family of the Heraclidæ.——The father of Periphus, a herald in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 17.

Equajusta, a town of Theſſaly.

Equĭcŏlus, a Rutulian engaged in the wars of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 684.

Equiria, feſtivals eſtabliſhed at Rome by Romulus, in honor of Mars, when horſe races and games were exhibited in the Campus Martius. Varro. de L. L. 5, c. 3.—Ovid. Faſt. 2, v. 859.

Equotutĭcum, a little town of Apulia, to which, as ſome ſuppoſe, Horace alludes in this verſe, 1, Sat. 5, v. 87.

"Manſuri oppidulo, verſu quod dicere non eſt."

Eracon, an officer of Alexander, impriſoned for his cruelty. Curt. 10.

Eræa, a city of Greece, deſtroyed in the age of Strabo, 3.

Erăsĭnus, a river of Peloponneſus, flowing for a little ſpace under the ground in Argolis. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 275.

Erasippus, a ſon of Hercules and Lyſippe.

Erasistrătus, a celebrated phyſician, grandſon to the philoſopher Ariſtotle. He diſcovered by the motion of the pulſe the love which Antiochus had conceived for his mother-in-law Statonice, and was rewarded with 100 talents for the cure by the father of Antiochus. He was a great enemy to bleeding and violent phyſic. He died B. C. 257. Val. Max. 5, c. 7.—Plut in Demetr.

Erăto, one of the Muſes, who preſided over lyric and tender poetry. She is repreſented as crowned with roſes and myrtle, holding a lyre in her hand. She appears with a thoughtful and ſometimes with a gay and animated look. She was invoked by lovers, eſpecially in the month of April, which, among the Romans, was more particularly devoted to love. Apollod. 1.—Virg. Ann. 2, c. 4.

Eratosthĕnes, a native of Cyrene, who was the ſecond entruſted with the care of the Alexandrian library. He dedicated his time to grammatical criticiſm and philoſophy, but more particularly to poetry and mathematics. He has been called a ſecond Plato, the coſmographer, and the geometer of the world. He firſt obſerved the obliquity of the ecliptic, and firſt found out how to meaſure the extent and circumference of the globe. He ſtarved himſelf after he had lived to his 82d year, B. C. 194. Some few fragments remain of his compoſitions. He collected the annals of the Egyptian kings by order of one of the Ptolemies. Cic. ad Attic. 2, ep. 6.—Varro. de R. R. 1, c. 2.

Eratostrătus, an Epheſian who burnt the famous temple of Diana, the ſame night that Alexander the Great was born. This burning, as ſome writers have obſerved, was not prevented or ſeen by the goddeſs of the place, who was then preſent at the labors of Olympias, and at the birth of the conqueror of Perſia. Eratoſtratus did this villainy merely to eternize his name by ſo uncommon an action. Plut. in Alex.—Val. Max. 8, c. 14.

Erătus, a ſon of Hercules and Dynaſte. Apollod.——A king of Sicyon, who died B. C. 1671.

Erbessus, an inland town of Sicily.

Erĕbus, a deity of hell, ſon of Chaos and Darkneſs. He married Night, by whom he had the light and the day. The poets often uſed the word Erebus to ſignify hell itſelf, and particularly that part where dwelt the ſouls of thoſe who had lived a virtuous life, from whence they paſſed into the Elyſian fields. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 17.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 26.

Erechtheus, ſon of Pandion 1ſt, was the ſixth king of Athens. He was father of Cecrops 2d, Metion, Pandorus, and four daughters, Creuſa, Orithya, Procris, and Othonia, by Praxithea. In a war againſt Eleuſis he ſacrificed Othonia, called alſo Chthonia, to obtain a victory which the oracle promiſed for ſuch a ſacrifice. In that war he killed Eumolpus, Neptune's ſon, who was the general of the enemy, for which he was ſtruck with thunder by Jupiter at Neptune's requeſt. Some ſay that he was drowned in the ſea. After death he received divine honors at Athens. He reigned 50 years, and died B. C. 1347. According to ſome accounts, he firſt introduced the myſteries of Ceres at Eleuſis. Ovid. 6, v. 877.—Pauſ. 2, c. 25.—Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Cic. pro Sext. 21. Tuſc. 1, c. 48. *Nat. ETEARCHUS, a king of Oaxus in Crete. After the death of his wife, he married a woman who made herſelf odious for her tyranny over her ſtep daughter Phronima. Etearchus gave ear to all the accuſations which were brought againſt his daughter, and ordered her to be thrown into the ſea. She had a ſon called Battus, who led a colony to Cyrene. Herodot. 4, c. 154.

ETĔOCLES, a ſon of Œdipus and Jocaſta. After his father's death, it was agreed between him and his brother Polynices, that they ſhould both ſhare the royalty, and reign alternately each a year. Eteocles by right of ſeniority firſt aſcended the throne, but after the firſt year of his reign was expired he refuſed to give up the crown to his brother according to their mutual agreement. Polynices, reſolved to puniſh ſuch an open violation of a ſolemn engagement, went to implore the aſſiſtance of Adraſtus, king of Argos. He received that king's daughter in marriage, and was ſoon after aſſiſted with a ſtrong army, headed by ſeven famous generals. Theſe hoſtile preparations were ſeen by Eteocles, who on his part did not remain inactive. He choſe ſeven brave chiefs to oppoſe the ſeven leaders of the Argives, and ſtationed them at the ſeven gates of the city. He placed himſelf againſt his brother Polynices, and he oppoſed Menalippus to Tydeus, Polyphontes to Capaneus, Megareus to Eteoclus, Hyperbius to Parthenopæus, and Lafthenes to Amphiaraus. Much blood was ſhed in light and unavailing ſkirmiſhes, and it was at laſt agreed between the two brothers that the war ſhould be decided by ſingle combat. They both fell in an engagement conducted with the moſt inveterate fury on either ſide, and it is even ſaid that the aſhes of theſe two brothers, who had been ſo inimical one to the other, ſeparated themſelves on the burning pile, as if ſenſible of reſentment, and hoſtile to reconciliation. Stat. Theb. Apollod. 3, c. 5, &c. —Æſchyl. Sept. ante Theb. —Eurip. in Phœniſ.—Pauſ. 5, c. 9. l. 9, c. 6.——A Greek, the firſt who raiſed altars to the Graces. Pauſ.

When her huſband had been ſtruck with thunder by Jupiter for his blaſphemies and impiety, and his aſhes had been ſeparated from thoſe of the reſt of the Argives, ſhe threw herſelf on his burning pile and periſhed in the flames. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 447.—Propert. 1. el. 15, v. 21.—Stat. Theb. 12, v. 800.——A daughter of the Strymon and Neæra. She married Argus, by whom ſhe had four children. Apollod. 2.

EVAGES, a poet famous for his genius but not for his learning.

EVAGORAS, a king of Cyprus who retook Salamis, which had been taken from his father by the Perſians. He made war againſt Artaxerxes, the king of Perſia with the aſſiſtance of the Egyptians, Arabians and Tyrians, and obtained ſome advantage over the fleet of his enemy. The Perſians however ſoon repaired their loſſes, and Evagoras ſaw himſelf defeated by ſea and land, and obliged to be tributary to the power of Artaxerxes, and to be ſtripped of all his dominions except the town of Salamis. He was aſſaſſinated ſoon after this fatal change of fortune, by an eunuch, 374 B. C. He left two ſons, Nicocles, who ſucceeded him, and Protagoras who deprived his nephew Evagoras of his poſſeſſions. Evagoras deſerves to be commended for his ſobriety, moderation, and magnanimity, and if he was guilty of any political error in the management of his kingdom, it may be ſaid, that his love of equity was a full compenſation. His grandſon bore the ſame name, and ſucceeded his father Nicocles. He ſhowed himſelf oppreſſive, and his uncle Protagoras took advantage of his unpopularity to deprive him of his power. Evagoras fled to Artaxerxes Ochus, who gave him a government more extenſive than that of Cyprus, but his oppreſſion rendered him odious, and he was accuſed before his benefactor and by his orders put to death. C. Nep. 12, c. 2.—Diod. 14.—Pauſ. 1, c. 3.—Juſtin. 5, c. 6.——A man of Elis who obtained a prize at the Olympian games. Pauſ. 5, c. 8.——A Spartan famous for his ſervices to the people of Elis. Id. 6, c. 10.——A ſon of Neleus and Chloris. Apollod. 1, c. 9.——A ſon of Priam. Id 3, c. 12.——A king of Rhodes.

He was the firſt who regulated the year among the Greeks, among whom he firſt brought from Egypt the celeſtial ſphere and regular aſtronomy. He died in his 53d year, B. C. 352. Lucan. 10, v. 187. Diog.——A native of Cyzicus, who ſailed all round the coaſt of Africa from the red ſea, and entered the mediterranean by the columns of Hercules.——A Sicilian, ſon of Agathocles.——A phyſician. Diog.

EVELTHON, a king of Salamis in Cyprus.

EUEMĔRIDAS, an hiſtorian of Cnidus.

EVEMĔRUS, an antient hiſtorian, of Meſſenia, intimate with Caſſander. He travelled over Greece and Arabia, and wrote an hiſtory of the gods, in which he proved that they all had been upon earth, as mere mortal men. Ennius tranſlated it into Latin. It is now loſt.

EVĒNUS, an elegiac poet of Paros.——A river of Ætolia flowing into the Ionian ſea. It receives its name from Evenus, ſon of Mars and Sterope, who being unable to overcome Idas, who had promiſed him his daughter Marpeſſa in marriage, if he ſurpaſſed him in running, grew ſo deſperate that he threw himſelf into the river, which afterwards bore his name. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 104.—Strab. 7.——A ſon of Jaſon and Hypſipyle, queen of Lemnos. Homer. Il. 7.

EVEPHĒNUS, a Pythagorean philoſopher, whom Dionyſius condemned to death becauſe he had alienated the people of Metapontum from his power. The philoſopher begged leave of the tyrant to go and marry his ſiſter, and promiſed to return in ſix months. Dionyſius conſented by receiving Eucritus, who pledged himſelf to die if Evephenus did not return in time. Evephenus returned at the appointed moment, to the aſtoniſhment of Dionyſius, and delivered his friend Eucritus from the death which threatened him. The tyrant was ſo pleaſed with theſe two friends, that he pardoned Evephenus, and begged to ſhare their friendſhip and confidence. Polyæn. 5.

EVERES, a ſon of Peteralaus——of Hercules and Parthenope.——The father of Tireſias. Apollod.

EVERGĒTÆ, a people of Scythia called alſo Arimaſpi. Curt. 7, c. 3.

EVERGĒTES, a ſirname, ſignifying benefactor, given to Philip of Macedonia, and to Antigonus Doſon, and Ptolemy of Egypt. It was alſo commonly given to the kings of Syria and Pontus, and we often ſee among the former an Alexander Evergetes, and among the latter a Mithridates Evergetes. Some of the Roman emperors alſo claimed that epithet, ſo expreſſive of benevolence and humanity.

EUGĂNEI, a people of Italy on the borders of the Adriatic, who upon being expelled by the Trojans, ſeized upon a part of the Alps. Sil. 8, v. 604.—Liv. 1, c. 1.

EULIMĒNE, one of the Nereides.

EUMĂCHIUS, a Campanian who wrote an hiſtory of Annibal.

EUMÆUS, a herdſman and ſteward of Ulyſſes, who knew his maſter at his return home from the Trojan war after 20 years abſence, and aſſiſted him in removing Penelope's ſuitors. Homer. Od. 13, &c.

EUMĒDES, a Trojan, ſon of Dolon, who came to Italy with Æneas, where he was killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 346.—Ovid. Triſt. 3, el. 4. v. 27.

EUMĒLIS, a famous augur. Stat. 4, Sylv. 8, v. 49.

EUMĒLUS, a ſon of Admetus, king of Pheræ in Theſſaly. He went to the Trojan war, and had the fleeteſt horſes in the Grecian army. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the games made in honor of Patroclus. Homer. Il. 2, & 23.—A man whoſe daughter was changed into a bird. Ovid. Met. 7, c. 390.——A man contemporary with Ptolemus, of whom he learned the art of agriculture. Pauſ. 7, c. 18.——One of the followers of Æneas, who firſt informed his friend that his fleet had been ſet on fire by the Trojan women. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 665.——One of the Bacchiadæ, who wrote, among other things, a poetical hiſtory of Corinth, B. C. 750. Pauſ. 2, c. 1.

EUMELUS, a king of the Cimmerian Boſphorus, who died B. C. 304.

EUMĒNES, a Greek officer in the army of Alexander, ſon of a charioteer. He was the moſt worthy of all the officers of Alexander to ſucceed after the death of his maſter. He conquered Paphlagonia, and Cappadocia, of which he obtained the government, till the power and jealouſy of Antigonus obliged him to retire. He joined his forces to thoſe of Perdiccas, and defeated Craterus and Neoptolemus. Neoptolemus periſhed by the hands of Eumenes. When Craterus had been killed during the war, his remains received an honorable funeral from the hand of the conqueror; and Eumenes, after weeping over the aſhes of a man who once was his deareſt friend, ſent his remains to his relations in Macedonia. Eumenes fought againſt Antipater and conquered him, and after the death of Perdiccas, his ally, his arms were directed against Antigonus, by whom he was conquered, chiefly by the treacherous conduct of his officers. This fatal battle obliged him to disband the greatest part of his army to secure himself a retreat, and he fled only with 700 faithful attendants to a fortified place on the confines of Cappadocia, called Nora, where he was soon besieged by the conqueror. He supported the siege for a year with courage and resolution, but some disadvantageous skirmishes so reduced him, that his soldiers, grown desperate, and bribed by the offers of the enemy, had the infidelity to betray him into the hands of Antigonus. The conqueror, from shame or remorse, had not the courage to visit Eumenes; but when he was asked by his officers, in what manner he wished him to be kept, he answered, keep him as carefully as you would keep a lion. This severe command was obeyed; but the asperity of Antigonus vanished in a few days, and Eumenes, delivered from the weight of chains, was permitted to enjoy the company of his friends. Even Antigonus hesitated whether he should not restore to his liberty a man with whom he had lived in the greatest intimacy while both subservient to the command of Alexander, and these secret emotions of pity and humanity were not a little encreased by the petitions of his son Demetrius for the release of Eumenes. But the calls of ambition prevailed; and when Antigonus recollected what an active enemy he had in his power, he ordered Eumenes to be put to death in the prison; (though some imagine he was murdered without the knowledge of his conqueror). His bloody commands were executed B. C. 315. Such was the end of a man who raised himself to power by merit alone. His skill in public exercises first recommended him to the notice of Philip, and under Alexander his attachment and fidelity to the royal person, and particularly his military accomplishments, promoted him to the rank of a general. Even his enemies revered him; and Antigonus, by whose orders he perished, honored his remains with a splendid funeral, and conveyed his ashes to his wife and family in Cappadocia. It has been observed, that Eumenes had such an universal influence over the successors of Alexander, that none during his life time dared to assume the title of king; and it does not a little reflect to his honor to consider that the wars he carried on were not from private or interested motives, but for the good and welfare of his deceased benefactor's children. Plut. & C. Nep. in vitâ.—Diod. 19.—Justin. 13.—Curt. 10.—Arrian.——A king of Pergamus, who succeeded his uncle Philetærus on the throne, B. C. 263. He made war against Antiochus the son of Seleucus, and enlarged his possessions by seizing upon many of the cities of the kings of Syria. He lived in alliance with the Romans, and made war against Prusias king of Bithynia. He was a great patron of learning, and given much to wine. He died of an excess in drinking, after a reign of 22 years. He was succeeded by Attalus. Strab. 15.——The second of that name succeeded his father Attalus on the throne of Asia and Pergamus. His kingdom was small and poor, but he rendered it powerful and opulent, and his alliance with the Romans did not a little contribute to the encrease of his dominions after the victories obtained over Antiochus the Great. He carried his arms against Prusias and Antigonus, and died B. C. 159, after a reign of 38 years, leaving the kingdom to his son Attalus 2d. He has been admired for his benevolence and magnanimity, and his love of learning greatly enriched the famous library of Pergamus, which had been founded by his predecessors in imitation of the Alexandrian collection of the Ptolemies. His brothers were so attached to him and devoted to his interest, that they enlisted among his body guards to show their fraternal fidelity. Strab. 13.—Justin. 31 & 34.—Polyb.——A celebrated orator of Athens about the beginning of the fourth century. Some of his harangues and orations are extant.——An historical writer in Alexander's army.

EUMĒNIA, a city of Phrygia, built by Attalus in honor of his brother Eumenes.—A city of Thrace,—of Caria,—of Hyrcania.

EUMĒNIDES & EUMENIS, a man mentioned Ovid 3. Trist. el. 4, v. 27.

EUMĒNIDES, a name given to the Furies by the antients. They sprang from the drops of blood which flowed from the wound which Cœlus received from his son Saturn. According to others they were daughters of the earth, and conceived from the blood of Saturn. Some make them daughters of Acheron and Night, or Pluto and Proserpine. According to the more received opinions, they were three in number, Tisiphone, Megæra, and Alecto, to which some add Nemesis. Plutarch mentions only one called Adrasta, daughter of Jupiter and Necessity. They were supposed to be the ministers of the vengeance of the gods, and therefore appeared stern and inexorable; always employed in punishing the guilty upon earth, as well as in the infernal regions. They inflicted their vengeance upon earth by wars, pestilence, and dissensions, and by the secret stings of conscience; and in hell they punished the guilty by continual flagellation and torments. They were also called Furiæ and Erinyes. Their worship was almost universal, and people dared not to mention their names or fix their

...it eyes upon their temples. They were ...nored with sacrifices and libations, and in ...hain they had a temple, which when en...ed by any one guilty of crime, suddenly ...ered him furious, and deprived him of ...e use of his reason. In the sacrifices, the ...taries used branches of cedar and of alder, ...thorn, saffron, and juniper, and the vic...s were generally turtle doves and sheep, ...th libations of wine and honey. They ...re generally represented with a grim and ...ghtful aspect, with a black and bloody gar...nt, and serpents wreathing round their ...ad instead of hair. They held a burning ...rch in one hand, and a whip of scorpions ...the other, and were always attended by ...rror, rage, paleness, and death. In hell ...y were seated around Pluto's throne, as ...e ministers of his vengeance. Æschyl. in ...nes.—Sophocl. in Oedip. Col.

EUMENIDIA, festivals in honor of the Eu...enides, called by the Athenians σεμναι θεαι ...rable goddesses. They were celebrated ...ce every year with sacrifices of pregnant ...es, with offerings of cakes made by the ...st eminent youths, and libations of honey ...d wine. At Athens none but free-born ...izens were admitted, such as had led a life ...e most virtuous and unsullied. EUMENIUS, a Trojan killed by Camilla ...Italy. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 666.

EUMOLPIDÆ, the priests of Ceres at the ...lebration of her festivals of Eleusis. They ...re descended from Eumolpus, a king of ...hrace, who was made priest of Ceres by ...rechtheus king of Athens. He became so ...werful after his appointment to the priest...ood, that he maintained a war against Erech...eus. This war proved fatal to both; Erech...eus and Eumolpus were both killed, and ...ace was re-established among their descen...nts, on condition that the priesthood ever ...mained in the family of Eumolpus, and the ...yal power in the house of Erechtheus. The ...esthood remained in the family of Eumol...s for 1200 years; and this is still more re...rkable, because he who was once appointed ...the holy office, was obliged to remain in ...rpetual celibacy. Paus. 2, c. 14.

EUMOLPUS, a king of Thrace, son of ...ptune and Chione. He was thrown into ...e sea by his mother, who wished to conceal ...r shame from her father. Neptune saved ...s life, and carried him into Æthiopia, ...here he was brought up by a woman, one ...f whose daughters he married. An act of ...olence to his sister-in-law obliged him to ...ve Æthiopia, and he fled to Thrace with ...is son Ismarus, where he married the daugh...r of Tegyrius the king of the country. This connection to the royal family rendered him ambitious; he conspired against his father-in-law, and fled, when the conspiracy was discovered, to Attica, where he was initiated in the mysteries of Ceres of Eleusis, and made Hierophantes or High Priest. He was afterwards reconciled to Tegyrius, and inherited his kingdom. He made war against Erechtheus, the king of Athens, who had appointed him to the office of high priest, and perished in battle. His descendants were also invested with the priesthood, which remained for about 1200 years in that family. Vid. Eumolpidæ. Apollod. 2, c. 5. &c.—Hygin. fab. 73.—Diod. 5.—Paus. 2, c. 14.

EUMONIDES, a Theban, &c. Plut.

EUNÆUS, a son of Jason by Hypsipyle daughter of Thoas. Homer. Il. 7.

EUNAPIUS, a physician, sophist and historian, born at Sardis. He flourished in the reign of Valentinian and his successors. He wrote an history of the Cæsars, of which few fragments remain. His life of the philosophers of his age is still extant. It is composed with fidelity and elegance, precision and correctness.

EUNŌMIA, a daughter of Jupiter, one of the Horæ. Apollod.

EUNŌMUS, a son of Prytanes, who succeeded his father on the throne of Sparta. Paus. 2, c. 36.——A famous musician of Locris, rival to Ariston. Strab. 6.——A man killed by Hercules. Apollod.——A Thracian, who advised Demosthenes not to be discouraged by his ill success in his first attempts to speak in public. Plut. in Dem.——The father of Lycurgus killed by a kitchen knife. Plut. in Lyc.

EUNUS, a Syrian slave who inflamed the minds of the servile multitude by pretended inspiration and enthusiasm. He filled a nut with sulphur in his mouth, and by artfully conveying fire to it, he breathed out flames to the astonishment of the people, who believed him to be a god, or something more than human. Oppression and misery compelled 4000 slaves to join his cause, and he soon saw himself at the head of 70,000 men. With such a force he defeated the Roman armies, till Perpenna obliged him to surrender by famine, and exposed on a cross the greatest part of his followers; B. C. 132. Plut. in Vert.

EUNYMOS, one of the Æolides.

EUORAS, a grove of Laconia. Paus. 3, c. 20.

EUPAGIUM, a town of Peloponnesus.

EUPALAMON, one of the hunters of the Calydonian boar. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 380.

EUPALAMUS, the father of Dædalus. Apollod. 3, c. 15.

EUPATOR, a son of Antiochus.——The surname of Eupator was given to many of the Asiatic princes, such as Mithridates, &c. Strab. 12.

EUPATORIA, a town of Paphlagonia, built by Mithridates, and called afterwards Pompeiopolis by Pompey. Plin. 6, c. 2.

EUPEITHES, a prince of Ithaca, father to Antinous. He was one of the most importuning lovers of Penelope. Homer. Od. 16.

EUPHAES, succeeded Antrocles on the throne of Messenia, and in his reign began the first Messenian war. He died B. C. 730. Paus. 4, c. 5. & 6.

EUPHANTUS, a poet and historian of Olynthus, son to Eubulides, and preceptor to Antigonus king of Macedonia. Diog. in Eucl.

EUPHEME, a woman who was nurse to the Muses, and mother of Crocus by Pan. Paus.

EUPHEMUS, a son of Neptune and Europa, who was among the Argonauts, and the hunters of the Calydonian boar. He was so swift and light that he could run over the sea without scarce wetting his feet. Pindar. Pyth. 4.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Paus. 5, c. 17. ——One of the Greek captains before Troy. Homer. Il. 2.

EUPHORBUS, a famous Trojan, son of Panthous. He was the first who wounded Patroclus, whom Hector killed. He perished by the hand of Menalaus, who hung his shield in the temple of Juno at Argos. Pythagoras, the founder of the doctrine of the Metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls, affirmed that he had been once Euphorbus, and that his soul recollected many exploits which had been done while it animated that Trojan's body. As a further proof of his assertion, he shewed at first sight the shield of Euphorbus in the temple of Juno. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 160.—Paus. 2, c. 17.—Homer. Il. 16 & 17.——A physician of Juba, king of Mauritania.

EUPHORION, a Greek poet, of Chalcis in Eubœa, in the age of Antiochus the Great. Tiberius took him for his model for correct writing, and was so fond of him that he hung his pictures in all the public libraries. His father's name was Polymnetus. He died in his 56 year B. C. 220. Cicero de Nat. D. 2. c. 64, calls him Obscurum.—The father of Æschylus bore the same name.

EUPHRANOR, a famous painter and sculptor of Corinth. Plin. 34, c. 8.——This name was common to many Greeks.

EUPHRATES, a disciple of Plato who governed Macedonia with absolute authority in the reign of Perdiccas, and rendered himself odious by his cruelty and pedantry. After the death of Perdiccas, he was murdered by Parmenio.——A stoic philosopher in the age of Adrian, who destroyed himself, with the emperor's leave, to escape the miseries of old age, A. D. 118. Dio.——A large and celebrated river of Mesopotamia, rising in mount Taurus in Armenia, and falling itself with the Tigris into the Persian gulf. It is very rapid in its course, and passes through the middle of the city of Babylon. It inundates the country of Mesopotamia at a certain season of the year, like the Nile in Egypt. Cyrus dried up its antient channel, and changed the course of the waters when he besieged Babylon. Strab. 11.—Mela. 1, c. 2. l. 3, c. 8.—Plin. 5, c. 24.

EUPHRON, an aspiring man of Sicyon, who enslaved his country by bribery. Just. 19.

EUPHROSYNA, one of the graces, sister to Aglaia and Thalia. Paus. 9, c. 35.

EUPLEA, an island of the Tyrrhene sea, near Neapolis. Stat. 3. Silv. 1, v. 149.

EUPOLIS, a comic poet of Athens, who flourished 435 years before the Christian æra. He severely lashed the vices and immoralities of his age. It is said that he had composed 17 dramatical pieces at the age of 17. He had a dog so attached to him, that at his death he refused all aliments, and killed himself on his tomb. Some suppose that Alcibiades put Eupolis to death because he had ridiculed him in his verses; but Suidas maintains that he perished in a sea fight between the Athenians and the Lacedæmonians in the Hellespont, and that on that account his countrymen, pitying his fate, decreed that no poet should ever after go to sea. Horat. 1, sat. 4, l. 2, sat. 10.—Cic. ad Attic. 6, ep. 1.—Ælian.

EUPOMPUS, a geometrician of Macedonia.—A painter. Plin. 34, c. 8.

EURIANASSA, a town near Chios. Plin. 5, c. 31.

EURIPIDES, a celebrated tragic poet born at Salamis the day on which the army of Xerxes was defeated by the Greeks. He studied eloquence under Prodicus, ethics under Socrates, and philosophy under Anaxagoras. He applied himself to dramatical composition, and his writings became so much the admiration of his countrymen that the unfortunate Greeks, who had accompanied Nicias in his expedition against Syracuse, were freed from slavery, only by repeating some verses from the pieces of Euripides. The poet often retired from the society of mankind, and confined himself in a solitary cave where he wrote and finished his most excellent tragedies. The talents of Sophocles were looked upon by Euripides with jealousy, and the great enmity which always reigned between the two poets, gave an opportunity to the comic muse of Aristophanes to ridicule them both on the stage with success and humor. During the representation of one of the tragedies of Euripides, the audience stance displeased with some lines in the composition, desired the writer to strike them off. Euripides heard this with indignation; he advanced forward on the stage, and told the spectators, that he came there to instruct them, and not to be taught by them. Another piece in which he called riches the summum bonum and the admiration of gods and men, gave equal dissatisfaction, but the poet declared the audience to listen with silent attention, for the conclusion of the whole would show them the punishment which attended the lovers of opulence. The ridicule and envy to which he was continually exposed, obliged him at last to remove from Athens. He retired to the court of Archelaus king of Macedonia, where he received the most conspicuous marks of royal munificence and friendship. His end was as deplorable as it was uncommon. It is said that the dogs of Archelaus met him in his solitary walks and tore his body to pieces 407 years before the christian era, in the 78th year of his age. Euripides wrote 75 tragedies, of which only 19 are extant; the most approved of which are his Phœnissæ, Orestes, Medea, Andromache, Electra, Hyppolytus, Iphigenia in Aulis, Iphigenia in Tauris, Hercules and the Troades. He is peculiarly happy in expressing the passions of love, especially the more tender and animated. To the pathos he has added sublimity, and the most common expressions have received a perfect polish from his pen. In his person, as it is reported, he was noble and majestic, and his deportment was always grave and serious. He was slow in composing and labored with difficulty, from which circumstance a foolish and malevolent poet once observed, that he had written 100 verses in three days, while Euripides had written only three. True, says Euripides, but there is this difference between your poetry and mine; yours will expire in three days, but mine shall live for ages to come. Euripides was such an enemy to the fair sex that some have called him mισογυνης woman hater, and perhaps from this aversion arise the impure and diabolical machinations which appear in his female characters, an observation, however, which he refuted, by saying he had faithfully copied nature. In spite of all this antipathy he was married twice, but his connections, were so injudicious, that he was compelled to divorce both his wives. The best editions of this great poet, are that of Musgrave, 4 vols. 4to. Oxon. 1778; that of Canter apud Commelin. 12mo. 2 vols. 1597; and that of Barnes, fol. Cantab. 1694. There are also several valuable editions of detached plays. Diod. 13.—Val. Max. 3, c. 7.—Cic. In. 1, c. 50. Or. 3, c. 7. Acad. 1, 4. Offic. 3. Finib. 2. Tusc. 1 & 4, &c.

EURIPUS, a narrow strait which separates the island of Eubœa from the coast of Bœotia. Its flux and reflux which continues regular during 18 or 19 days, and was uncommonly unsettled the rest of the month, was a matter of deep inquiry among the ancients, and it is said that Aristotle threw himself into it because he was unable to find out the causes of that phenomenon. Liv. 28, c. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Plin. 2, c. 95.—Strab. 9.

EURISTHENES. Vid. Eurysthenes.

EURŌMUS, a city of Caria.

EURŌPA, one of the three grand divisions of the earth, known among the antients. It is superior to the others in the learning, power and abilities of its inhabitants. It is bounded on the east by the Ægean sea, Hellespont, Euxine, Palus Mœotis, and the Tanais in a northern direction. The Mediterranean divides it from Africa on the south, and on the west and north it is washed by the Atlantic and Northern Oceans. It is supposed to receive its name from Europa, who was carried there by Jupiter. Mela 2, c. 1. — Plin. 3, c. 1, &c. A daughter of Agenor king of Phœnicia, and Telephassa. She was so beautiful that Jupiter became enamoured of her, and the better to seduce her he assumed the shape of a bull and mingled with the herds of Agenor, while Europa, with her female attendants were gathering flowers in the meadows. Europa caressed the beautiful animal and at last had the courage to sit upon his back. The god took advantage of her situation, and with precipitate steps retired towards the shore and crossed the sea with Europa on his back, and arrived safe in Crete. Here he assumed his original shape and declared his love. The nymph consented, though she had once made vows of perpetual celibacy, and she became mother of Minos, Sarpedon, and Rhadamanthus. After this distinguished amour with Jupiter, she married Asterius king of Crete. This monarch seeing himself without children by Europa, adopted the fruit of her amours with Jupiter, and always esteemed Minos, Sarpedon and Rhadamanthus, as his own children. Some suppose that Europa lived about 1552 years before the Christian era. Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 13.—Moseh. Idyl.—Apollod. 2, c. 5. l. 3. c. 1.——One of the Oceanides.——A part of Thrace near mount Hæmus. Justin. 7, c. 1.

EURYBIA, the mother of Lucifer and all the stars. Hesiod.——A daughter of Pontus and Terra, mother of Astræus, Pallas and Perses, by Crius.——A daughter of Thespius. Apollod.

EURYBIĂDES, a Spartan general of the Grecian fleet at the battles of Artemisium and Salamis against Xerxes. He has been charged with want of courage and with ambition. He offered to strike Themistocles when he wished to speak about the manner of attacking the Persians, upon which the Athenian said, strike me but hear me. Herodot. 8, c. 2, 74, &c.—Plut. in Them. C. Nep. in Them.

EURYBIUS, a son of Eurytus king of Argos killed in a war between his countrymen and the Athenians. Apollod. 2, c. 8.——A son of Nereus and Chloris. Id. 1, c. 9.

EURYCLEA, a beautiful daughter of Ops of Ithaca. Laertes bought her for 20 oxen, and gave her his son Ulysses's nurse, and treated her with much tenderness and attention. Homer. Od. 19.

EURYCLES, an orator of Syracuse who proposed to put Nicias and Demosthenes to death, and to confine to hard labour the Athenian soldiers in the quarries. Plut.——A Lacedæmonian at the battle of Actium on the side of Augustus. Id. in Anton.——A soothsayer of Athens.

EURYCRĂTES, a king of Sparta, descended from Hercules. Herodot. 7, c. 204.

EURYCRĂTIDAS, a son of Anaxander, &c. Herodot. 7, c. 204.

EURYDĂMAS, a Trojan skilled in the interpretation of dreams. His two sons were killed by Diomedes during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 5.——One of Penelope's suitors. Od. 22.——A wrestler of Cyrene, who, in a combat, had his teeth dashed to pieces by his antagonist, which he swallowed without showing any signs of pain, or discontinuing the fight. Ælian. V. H. 10, c. 19.——A son of Ægyptus. Apollod.

EURYDĂME, the wife of Leotychides, king of Sparta. Herodot.

EURYDĂMIDAS, a king of Lacedæmon, of the family of the Proclidæ. Paus. 3, c. 10.

EURŸDICE, the wife of Amyntas, king of Macedonia. She had by her husband Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip, and one daughter called Euryone. A criminal partiality for her daughter's husband, to whom she offered her hand and the kingdom, made her conspire against Amyntas, who must have fallen a victim to her infidelity had not Euryone discovered it. Amyntas forgave her. Alexander ascended the throne after his father's death, and perished by the ambition of his mother. Perdiccas who succeeded him shared his fate, but Philip who was the next in succession secured himself against all attempts from his mother, and ascended the throne with peace and universal satisfaction. Eurydice fled to Iphicrates the Athenian general for protection. The manner of her death is unknown. C. Nep. in Iphic. 3.——A daughter of Amyntas, who married her uncle Aridæus, the illegitimate son of Philip. After the death of Alexander the Great, Aridæus ascended the throne of Macedonia, but he was totally governed by the intrigues of his wife, who called back Cassander and joined her forces with his to march against Polyperchon and Olympias. Eurydice was forsaken by her troops, Aridæus was pierced through with arrows by order of Olympias, who commanded Eurydice to destroy herself either by poison, the sword, or the halter. She chose the latter.——The wife of the poet Orpheus. As she fled before Aristæus who wished to offer her viofence, ſhe was bit by a ſerpent in the graſs, and died of the wound. Orpheus was ſo diſconſolate that he ventured to go to hell, where by the melody of his lyre, he obtained from Pluto the reſtoration of his wife to life provided he did not look behind before he came upon earth. He violated the conditions, his eagerneſs to ſee his wife rendered him forgetful. He looked behind and Eurydice was for ever taken from him. [Vid Orpheus.] Virg. G. 4, v. 457, &c.—Pauſ. 9, c. 30.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 30, &c.——A daughter of Adraſtus. Apollod. 3, c. 12.——One of the Danaides who married Dyas. Id. 2, c. 1.——The wife of Lycurgus, king of Nemæa in Peloponneſus. Id. 1, c. 9.——A daughter of Actor. Id.——A wife of Æneas. Pauſ. 10, c. 26.——A daughter of Amphiaraus. Id. 3, c. 17.——A daughter of Antipater, who married one of the Ptolemies. Id. 1, c. 7.——A daughter of king Philip. Id. 5, c. 17.——A daughter of Lacedæmon. Id 3, c. 13.——A daughter of Clymenus, who married Neſtor. Homer. Od.——A wife of Demetrius, deſcended from Miltiades. Plut. in Demetr.

EURYGANIA, a wife of Œdipus. Apollod.

EURYLEON, a king of the Latins, called alſo Aſcanius.

EURÝLŎCHUS, one of the companions of Ulyſſes the only one who did not taſte the potions of Circe. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 287.——A man who broke a conduit which conveyed water into Cyrrhæ, &c. Polyæn. 6.——A man who diſcovered the conſpiracy which was made againſt Alexander by Hermolaus and others. Curt. 8. c. 6.

EURÝMĂCHUS, a powerful Theban who ſeized Platæa by treachery, &c.—One of Penelope's ſuitors. A ſon of Antenor.—A lover of Hippodamia. Pauſ.

EURYMĔDE, the wife of Glaucus king of Ephyra. Apollod.

EURYMĔDON, the father of Peribœa, by whom Neptune had Nauſithous. Homer. Od. 7.——A river of Pamphylia, near which the Perſians were defeated by the Athenians under Cimon. B. C. 470.

EURYMĔNES, a ſon of Neleus and Chloris. Apollod.

EURYNŌME, one of the Oceanides, mother of the Graces. Heſiod.——A daughter of Apollo, mother of Adraſtus and Eriphyle.—A woman of Lemnos, &c. Flacc. 2, v. 136.——The wife of Lycurgus ſon of Aleus. Apollod. 3, c. 9.——The mother of Aſopus by Jupiter. Id. 3, c. 12.——One of Penelope's female attendants. Homer. Il. 17.——An Athenian ſent with a reinforcement to Nicias in Sicily. Plut. in Nic.

EURYNŌMUS, one of the deities of hell. Pauſ. 10, c. 28.

EURYŌNE, a daughter of Amyntas king of Macedonia, by Eurydice.

EURYPON, a king of Sparta, ſon of Sous. His reign was ſo glorious that his deſcendants were called Eurypontidæ. Pauſ. 3, c. 7.

EURYPŸLE, a daughter of Theſpius.

EURŸPYLUS, a ſon of Telephus killed in the Trojan war by Pyrrhus. He made his court to Caſſandra. Homer. Il. 11.——A Grecian at the Trojan war. Homer Il. 2.——A prince of Olenus, who went with Hercules againſt Laomedon. Pauſ. 7, c. 19.——A ſon of Meciſteus who ſignaliſed himſelf in the war of the Epigoni againſt Thebes. Apollod. 3.——A ſon of Temenus king of Meſſenia, who conſpired againſt his father's life. Id. 3. c. 6.——A ſon of Neptune killed by Hercules. Id. 2, c. 7.——One of Penelope's ſuitors. Id. 3. c. 10.——A Theſſalian who became delirious for looking into a box which fell to his ſhare after the plunder of Troy. Pauſ. 7, c. 19. Eurypylus, a ſoothſayer in the Grecian camp before Troy, ſent to conſult the oracle of Apollo, how his countrymen could return ſafe home. The reſult of his enquiries was the injunction to offer an human ſacrifice. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 114.

EURYSTHĔNES, a ſon of Ariſtodemus, who lived in perpetual diſſention with his twin brother Procles, while they both ſat on the Spartan throne. It was unknown which of the two was born firſt, the mother, who wiſhed to ſee both her ſons raiſed on the throne, refuſed to declare it, and they were both appointed kings of Sparta by order of the oracle of Delphi, B. C. 1102. After the death of the two brothers, the Lacedæmonians, who knew not to what family the right of ſeniority and ſucceſſion belonged, permitted two kings to ſit on the throne, one of each family. The deſcendants of Euryſthenes were called Euryſthenidæ, and thoſe of Procles, Proclidæ. It was inconſiſtent with the laws of Sparta for two kings of the ſame family to aſcend the throne together, yet that law has ſometimes been violated by oppreſſion and tyranny. Euryſthenes had a ſon called Agis who ſucceeded him. His deſcendants were called Agidæ. There ſat on the throne of Sparta 31 kings of the family of Euryſthenes, and only 24 of the Proclidæ. The former were the more illuſtrious. Herodot. 4, c. 147. l. 6, c. 52.—Pauſ. 3. c. 1.—C. Nep. in Ageſ.

EURYSTHENIDÆ, Vid. Euryſthenes.

EURYSTHEUS, a king of Argos and Mycenæ, ſon of Sthenelus, and Nicippe the daughter of Pelops. Juno haſtened his birth by two months, that he might come into the world before Hercules the ſon of Alcmena, as the younger of the two was doomed by order of Jupiter to be ſubſervient to the will of the other. [Vid. Alcmena.]

This natural right was cruelly exercised by Eurystheus, who was jealous of the fame of Hercules, and who to destroy so powerful a relation imposed upon him the most dangerous and uncommon enterprises well known by the name of the twelve labors of Hercules. The success of Hercules in atchieving those perilous labors alarmed Eurystheus in a greater degree, and he furnished himself with a brazen vessel, where he might secure himself a safe retreat in case of danger. After the death of Hercules, Eurystheus renewed his cruelties against his children, and made war against Ceyx king of Trachinia because he had given them support, and treated them with hospitality. He was killed in the prosecution of this war by Hyllus the son of Hercules. His head was sent to Alcmena the mother of Hercules, who mindful of the cruelties which her son had suffered, insulted it, and tore out the eyes with the most inveterate fury. Eurystheus was succeeded on the throne of Argos by Atreus his nephew. Hygin. fab. 30 & 32.—Apollod. 2, c. 4, &c.—Paus. 1, c. 33. l. 3, c. 6.—Ovid. Met. 9, fab. 6. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 292.

EURYTE, a daughter of Hippodamus, who married Pathaon. Apollod.——The mother of Hallirhotius, by Neptune. Id.

EURYTHEÆ, a town of Achaia. Paus. 7, c. 18.

EURYTHIS, a daughter of Thespius.—A daughter of Leucippus. Apollod.

EURYTHEMIS, the wife of Thestius. Apollod.

EURYTHION & EURYTION, a Centaur whose insolence to Hippodamia was the cause of the quarrel between the Lapithæ and Centaurs, at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12.—Paus. 5, c. 10.—Hesiod. Theog.——A herdsman of Geryon killed by Hercules. Apollod. 2.——A king of Sparta who seized upon Mantinea by stratagem. Polyæn. 2.——One of the Argonauts. Ovid. Æn. 5, v. 495.——A silversmith. Id. 10, v. 499.——A man of Heraclea convicted of adultery. His punishment was the cause of the abolition of the oligarchical power there. Aristot. 5 Polit.

EURYTUS, a son of Mercury, among the Argonauts. Flacc. 1, v. 439. A king of Œchalia, father to Iole. He offered his daughter to him who shot a bow better than himself. Hercules conquered him, and put him to death because he refused him his daughter as the prize of his victory. Apollod. 2. c. 4 & 7.——A son of Actor, concerned in the wars between Augias and Hercules.—A son of Augias killed by Hercules as he was going to Corinth to celebrate the Isthmian games. Apollod.——A person killed in hunting the Calydonian boar.——A son of Hippocoon. Id. 3, c. 10.——A giant killed by Hercules or Bacchus for making war against the Gods.

EURYTIS, (idos) a patronymic of Iole daughter of Eurytus. Ovid. Met. 9, fab. 11.

EUSEBIA, an empress, wife to Constantius, &c.

EUSEBIUS, a bishop of Cæsarea in great favor with the emperor Constantine. He was concerned in the theological disputes of Arius and Athanasius, and distinguished himself by his writings which consisted of an ecclesiastical history, the life of Constantine, Chronicon, evangelical preparations, and other numerous treatises, most of which are now lost. The best edition of his Præparatio & Demonstratio Evangelica, is by Vigerus, 2 vols. folio; Rothomagi, 1628; and of his ecclesiastical history by Reading, folio Cantab. 1720.

EUSEBIUS, a surname of Bacchus.

EUSEPUS & PEDASUS, the twin sons of Bucolion killed in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 6.

EUSTATHIUS, a Greek commentator on the works of Homer. The best edition of this very valuable author, is that published at Basil, 3 vols fol. 1560. It is to be lamented the design of Alexander Politus, begun at Florence, in 1735, and published in the first 5 books of the Iliad, is not executed as a Latin translation of these excellent commentaries is among the desiderata of the present day.——A man who wrote a very foolish romance in Greek, entitled de Ismeniæ & Ismenes amoribus, edited by Gaulminus, 8vo. Paris. 1617.

EUTÆA, a town of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 27.

EUTELIDAS, a famous statuary of Argos. Id. 6, c. 10.

EUTERPE, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over music, and was looked upon as the inventress of the flute. She is represented as crowned with flowers and holding a flute in her hands. Some mythologists attributed to her the invention of tragedy, more commonly supposed to be the production of Melpomene.——The name of the mother of Themistocles according to some.

EUTHYCRATES, a sculptor of Sicyon, son of Lysippus. He was peculiarly happy in the proportions of his statues. Those of Hercules and Alexander were in general esteem, and particularly that of Medea, which was carried on a chariot by four horses. Plin. 34, c. 8.——A man who betrayed Olynthus to Philip.

EUTHYNOMUS, an orator and rhetorician who greatly distinguished himself by his eloquence, &c. Strab. 14.

EUTHYMUS, a celebrated boxer of Locri in Italy. &c. Paus. 6, c. 6.

EUTRAPELUS, a man described as artful and fallacious by Horat. 1, ep. 18, v. 32. ——A hair dresser. Martial 7, ep. 82.

EUTRAPELUS, (Volumn) a friend of M. Antony, &c.

EUTROPIUS a Latin historian in the age of Julian, under whom he carried arms in the fatal expedition against the Persians. His origin as well as his dignity are unknown; yet some suppose, from the epithet of Clarissimus prefixed to his history, that he was a Roman senator. He wrote an epitome of the history of Rome, from the age of Romulus to the reign of the emperor Valens, to whom the work was dedicated. He wrote a treatise on medicine without being acquainted with the art. Of all his works the Roman history alone is extant. It is composed with conciseness and precision, but without elegance. The best edition of Eutropius is that of Haverkamp, Cum notis variorum, 8vo. L. Bat. 1729 & 1762.——A famous eunuch at the court of Arcadius the son of Theodosius the great, &c.

EUTYCHIDE, a woman who was thirty times brought to bed, and carried to the grave by twenty of her children. Plin. 7, c. 3.

EUTYCHIDES, a learned servant of Atticus, &c. Cic. 15, ad Attic. ——A sculptor.

EUXANTHIUS, a daughter of Minos and Dexithea. Apollod.

EUXINUS, a man who wrote a poetical history of the fabulous ages of Italy. Dionys. Hal. 1.

EUXINUS PONTUS, a sea between Asia and Europe, partly at the north of Asia Minor and at the west of Colchis. It was antiently called ἄξενος inhospitable, on account of the savage manners of the inhabitants on its coasts. Commerce with foreign nations, and the plantation of colonies in their neighbourhood gradually softened their roughness, and the sea was no longer called Axenus, but Euxenus, hospitable. Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 13. l. 4, el 4. v. 54.—Strab. 2, &c.—Mela. 1, c. 1.—Plin. 6.

EUXIPPE, a woman who killed herself because the ambassadors of Sparta had offered violence to her virtue, &c.

EXADIUS, one of the Lapithæ at the nuptials of Pirithous. Homer Il. 1, v. 264. Ovid Met. 12, v. 266.

EXÆTHES, a Parthian who cut off the head of Crassus, &c. Polyæn. 7.

EXAGŌNUS, the ambassador of a nation in Cyprus who came to Rome and talked so much of the power of herbs, serpents, &c. that the consuls ordered him to be thrown into a vessel full of serpents. These venomous creatures far from hurting him, caressed him, and harmlessly licked him with their tongues. Plin. 28, c. 3.

EXOMĀTRÆ, a people of Asiatic Sarmatia. Flacc. 6, v. 144.

FABARIS, a river of Italy in the territories of the Sabines. It was also called Farfarus. Virg. Æn. 7. v. 715.

FABIA. Vid. Fabius Fabricianus.

FABIA LEX, de ambitu was to circumscribe the number of Sectatores or attendants which were allowed to candidates in canvassing for some high office. It was proposed but did not pass.

FABIA, a tribe at Rome. Horat. 1, ep. 7, v. 52.——A vestal virgin sister to Terentia Cicero's wife.

FABIANI, some of the Luperci at Rome, instituted in honor of the Fabian family.

FABII, a noble and powerful family at Rome, who derived their name from faba, a bean, because some of their ancestors cultivated this pulse. They were once so numerous that they took upon themselves to wage a war against the Veientes. They came to a general engagement near the Cremera, in which all the family, consisting of 306 men, were totally slain. B. C. 477. There only remained one whose tender age had detained him at Rome, and from him arose the noble Fabii in the following ages. Dionys. 9.—Liv. 2, c. 46, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 2.—Ovid Trist. 2, v. 235.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 845.

FABIUS Maximus Rullianus was the first of the Fabii who obtained the surname of Maximus, for lessening the power of the populace at elections. He was master of horse, and his victory over the Samnites in that capacity, nearly cost him his life, because he engaged the enemy without the command of the dictator. He was five times consul, twice dictator, and once censor. He triumphed over seven different nations in the neighbourhood of Rome, and rendered himself illustrious by his patriotism.——Rusticus, an historian in the age of Claudius and Nero. He was intimate with Seneca, and the encomiums which Tacitus passes upon his style, make us regret the loss of his compositions.——

Mercuttius, an historian in the second century.——A Roman lawyer whom Horat. 1, sat. 2, v. 134. ridicules as having been caught in adultery.——Q. Maximus, a celebrated Roman, who from a dull and inactive childhood was raised to the highest offices of the state. In his first consulship, he obtained a victory over Liguria, and the fatal battle of Thrasymenus occasioned his election to the dictatorship. In this important office he began to oppose Annibal not by fighting him in the open field, like his predecessors, but he continually harassed his army by countermarches and ambuscades, from which he received the firname of Cunctator or delayer. Such operations, for the commander of the Roman armies gave offence to some, and Fabius was even accused of cowardice. He, however, patiently bore to see his master of horse raised to share the dictatorial dignity with himself, by means of his enemies at home. When he had laid down his office of Dictator, his successors, for a while, followed his plan, but the rashness of Varro, and his contempt for the operations of Fabius occasioned the fatal battle of Cannæ. Tarentum was obliged to surrender to his arms after the battle of Cannæ, and on that occasion the Carthaginian enemy observed that Fabius was the Annibal of Rome. When he had made an agreement with Annibal for the ransom of the captives, which was totally disapproved by the Roman Senate, he sold all his estates to pay the money, rather than forfeit his word to the enemy. The bold proposals of young Scipio to go and carry the war from Italy to Africa, was rejected by Fabius, as chimerical and dangerous. He did not, however, live to see the success of the Roman arms, under Scipio, and the conquest of Carthage by measures which he treated with contempt and heard with indignation. He died in the 100th year of his age, after he had been five times consul, and twice honored with a triumph. The Romans were so sensible of his great merit and services that the expences of his funeral were defrayed from the public treasury. Plut. in vita. Flor. 2. c. 6.—Liv.—Polyb. His son bore the same name, and showed himself worthy of his noble father's virtues. During his consulship he received a visit from his father on horseback in the camp. The son ordered the father to dismount, and the old man chearfully obeyed, embracing his son, and saying I wished to know whether you knew what it is to be consul. He died before his father, and the Cunctator with the moderation of a philosopher delivered a funeral oration over the dead body of his son. Plut. in Fabio.——Pictor the first Roman historian who florished, B. C. 225. He is the first who wrote an historical account of his country. The work which is now extant, and which is attributed to him, is a spurious composition.——A loquacious person mentioned by Horace, Sat. 1, v. 14.——A Roman Consul, surnamed Ambustus, because he was struck with lightening.——A Lieutenant of Cæsar in Gaul.——Fabricianus, a Roman assassinated by his wife Fabia, that she might more freely enjoy the company of a favourite youth. His son was saved from his mother's cruelties, and when he came of age he avenged his father's death by murdering his mother and her adulterer. The Senate took cognizance of the action, and patronized the parricide. Plut. in Parall.——A chief priest at Rome when Brennus took the city. Plut.——A Roman sent to consult the oracle of Delphi, while Annibal was in Italy.——Another chosen Dictator merely to create new Senators.——A lieutenant of Lucullus defeated by Mithridates.——A son of Paulus Æmilius, adopted into the family of the Fabii.——A Roman surnamed Allobrogicus from his victory over the Allobroges, &c. Flor. 2, c. 17.——Another chosen general against the Carthaginians in Italy. He lost all his forces in a battle, and fell wounded by the side of Annibal. Plut. in Parall.——A Consul with J. Cæsar, who conquered Pompey's adherents in Spain.——A high priest who wrote some annals and made war against Viriathus in Spain. Liv. 30, c. 26.—Flor. 3, c. 2.

FABRATERIA, a colony and town of the Volsci in Latium. Ital. 8, c. 398.

FABRICIUS, a Latin writer in the reign of Nero, who employed his pen in satyrizing and defaming the Senators. His works were burnt by order of Nero.——Caius, a celebrated Roman who in his first consulship, obtained several victories over the Samnites and Lucanians, and was honored with a triumph. The riches which were acquired in those battles were immense, the soldiers were liberally rewarded by the consul, and the treasury was enriched with 400 talents. Two years after Fabricius went as ambassador to Pyrrhus, and refused with contempt the presents, and heard with indignation the offers, which might have corrupted the fidelity of a less virtuous citizen. Pyrrhus had occasion to admire the magnanimity of Fabricius, but his astonishment was more powerfully awakened when he saw him make a discovery of the perfidious offers of his physician, who pledged himself to the Roman general for a sum of money to poison his royal master. To this greatness of soul was added the most consummate knowledge of military affairs, and the greatest simplicity of manners. Fabricius never used rich plate at his table. A small salt-cellar, whose feet were of horn, was the the only silver veſſel which appeared in his houſe. This contempt of luxury and uſeleſs ornaments Fabricius wiſhed to inſpire among the people, and during his cenſorſhip he baniſhed from the ſenate Cornelius Ruffinus, who had been twice conſul and dictator becauſe he kept in his houſe more than ten pound weight of ſilver plate. Such were the manners of the conqueror of Pyrrhus who obſerved that he wiſhed rather to command thoſe that had money, than poſſeſs it himſelf. He lived and died in the greateſt poverty. His body was buried at the public charge, and the Roman people were obliged to give a dowry to his two daughters, when they had arrived to years of maturity. Val. Max. 2, c. 9. l. 4, c. 4.—Flor. 1, c. 18. Cic. 3, de offic.—Plut. in Pyrrh. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 844.——A bridge at Rome, built by the conſul Fabricius. Horat. 2. Ser. 3, v. 36.

FABULLA, a proſtitute, &c. Juv. 2. v. 68.

FADUS, a Rutulian killed in the night by Euryalus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 344.

FÆSŬLÆ, a town of Etruria, famous for its augurs. Ital. 8, v. 478.

FALCIDIA LEX, was enacted by the tribune Falcidius, A. U. C. 713, concerning wills and the right of heirs.

FALERII, a town of Etruria.

FALERINA, a tribe at Rome. Liv. 9, c. 20.

FĂLERNUS, a fertile mountain and plain of Campania, famous for its wine, which the Roman poets have greatly celebrated. Virg. G. 2, v. 96. Horat. 1, od. 20, v. 10. 2. Sat. 4, v. 15.—Strab. 5.

FĂLISCI, a people of Etruria, originally a Macedonian colony. When they were beſieged by Camillus, a ſchool maſter went out of the gates of the city with his pupils and betrayed them into the hands of the Roman enemy, that by ſuch a poſſeſſion he might eaſily oblige the place to ſurrender. Camillus heard the propoſal with indignation, and ordered the man to be ſtripped naked and whipped back to the town by thoſe whom his perfidy wiſhed to betray. This inſtance of generoſity operated upon the people ſo powerfully that they ſurrendered to the Romans. Plut. in Camill.

FALISCUS GRATIUS. Vid. Gratius.

FAMA, (fame), was worſhipped by the antients as a powerful goddeſs, and generally repreſented blowing a trumpet, &c. Stat. 3. Theb. 427.

FANNIA, a woman of Minturnæ, who, hoſpitably entertained Marius in his flight, though he had formerly ſat in judgment upon her, and divorced her from her huſband.

FANNIA LEX; de Sumptibus, by L. Fannius, the conſul, A. U. C. 588. It enacted, that no perſon ſhould ſpend more than 100 aſſes a day at the great feſtivals, and 30 aſſes on other days, and ten at all other times.

FANNII, two orators of whom Cicero ſpeaks in Brut.

FANNIUS, an inferior poet ridiculed by Horace becauſe his poems and pictures were conſecrated in the library of Apollo, on mount Palatine at Rome, as it was then uſual for ſuch as poſſeſſed merit. Horat. 1. Sat. 4, v. 21.——A perſon who killed himſelf when apprehended in a conſpiracy againſt Auguſtus. Mart. 12. ep. &c.——Caius, an author in Trajan's reign, whoſe hiſtory of the cruelties of Nero is greatly regretted.

FAVENTIA, a town of Spain. Plin. 3. c. 1.——Of Italy. Ital. 8, v. 597.

FAVERIA, a town of Iſtria. Liv. 41. c. 11.

FAULA, a miſtreſs of Hercules.

FAUNA, a deity among the Romans. She was daughter of Picus and was originally called Marica. Her marriage with Faunus procured her the name of Fauna, and her knowledge of futurity that of Fatua and Fatidica. It is ſaid that ſhe never ſaw a man after her marriage with Faunus, and that her uncommon chaſtity occaſioned her being ranked among the gods after death. She is the ſame, according to ſome, as Bona Mater. Some mythologiſts accuſe her of drunkenneſs, and ſay that ſhe expired under the blows of her huſband, for an immoderate uſe of wine. Virg Æn. 7, v. 47, &c. Varro. Juſtin. 43, c. 1.

FAUNALIA, feſtivals at Rome, in honor of Faunus.

FAUNI, certain deities of the country repreſented as having the legs, feet and ears of goats, and the reſt of the body human. They were called ſatyrs by the Greeks. The peaſants offered them a lamb or a kid, with great ſolemnity. Virg. G. 1, v. 10, Ovid. Met. 6, v. 392.

FAUNUS, a ſon of Picus, who is ſaid to have reigned in Italy about 1300 years B. C. His bravery as well as wiſdom, have given riſe to the tradition that he was ſon of Mars. His great popularity, and his fondneſs for agriculture made his ſubjects revere him as one of their country deities after death. He was represented with all the equipage of the satyrs, and was consulted to give oracles. Dionys. 1, c. 7. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 47, l. 8, v. 314, l. 10, v. 55. Horat. 1, od. 17.

FAUSTINA, the wife of the emperor Antoninus, famous for her debaucheries. Her daughter of the same name, blessed with beauty, liveliness and wit, became the most abandoned of her sex. She married M. Aurelius.——The third wife of the emperor Heliogabalus bore that name.

FAUSTITAS, a goddess among the Romans supposed to preside over cattle. Horat. 4. od. 5, v. 17.

FAUSTŬLUS, a shepherd ordered to expose Romulus and Remus. He privately brought them up at home. Liv. 1, c. 4.—Justin. 43, c. 2. Plut. in Rom.

FAUSTUS, an obscure poet under the first Roman emperors, two of whose dramatic pieces, Thebæ and Tereus, Juvenal mentions. 7, v. 12.

FEBRUA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over purifications.

FECIALES a number of priests at Rome, employed in declaring war and making peace. When the Romans thought themselves injured, one of the sacerdotal body was impowered to demand redress, and after the allowance of 33 days to consider the matter, war was declared if submissions were not made, and the Fecialis hurled a bloody spear into the territories of the enemy in proof of intended hostilities. Liv. 1, c. 3, l. 4, c. 30.

FELGINAS, a Roman knight, killed by Pompey at Dyrrachium. Cæs. 3, Bell. Civ.

FENESTELLA, a Roman historian in the age of Augustus. He died at Cumæ.——One of the gates of Rome. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 578.

FERĀLIA, a festival in honor of the dead, observed at Rome, the 17th or 21st of February. It continued for 11 days, during which time presents were carried to the groves of the deceased, marriages were forbidden; and the temples of the Gods were shut. It was universally believed that the manes of their departed friends came and hovered over their graves, and feasted upon the provisions that the hand of piety and affection had procured for them. Their punishments in hell were also suspended, and during that time they enjoyed rest and plenty.

FERENTĀNUM, & FERENTUM, a town of Apulia. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 53.—Horat. 3, od. 4, v. 16.

FERĒTRIUS, a surname of Jupiter, a ferendo, because he had assisted the Romans, or a feriendo, because he had conquered their enemies under Romulus. He had a temple at Rome, built by Romulus. It was there that the spoils called opima, were always carried.—Liv. 1, c. 10. Plut. in Rom.

FERŌNIA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the woods and groves. The name is derived a ferendo, because she gave assistance to her votaries, or perhaps from the town Feronia, near mount Soracte, where she had a temple. It was usual to make a yearly sacrifice to her, and to wash the face and hands in the waters of the sacred fountain, which flowed near her temple. It is said that those who were filled with the spirit of this goddess could walk barefooted over burning coals without receiving any injury from the flames. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 800.—Varr. de L. L. 4, c. 10.—Ital. 13. Strab. 5.—A town at the foot of mount Soracte. Horat. 1. Sat. 5. v. 24.

FERIÆ LATINÆ, festivals at Rome instituted by Tarquin the Proud. The principal magistrates of 47 towns in Latium, usually assembled on a mount near Rome, where they altogether with the Roman magistrates offered a bull to Jupiter Latialis, of which they carried home some part after the immolation, after they had sworn mutual friendship and alliance. It continued but one day originally, but in process of time four days were dedicated for its celebration. Dionys. Hal. 4. Cic. ep. 6, Liv. 21, &c. The feriæ among the Romans were certain days set apart to celebrate festivals, and during that time it was unlawful for any person to work. They were either public or private. The public were of four different kinds. The feriæ stativæ, were certain immoveable days always marked in the calendar and observed by the whole city with much festivity and public rejoicing. The feriæ conceptivæ were moveable feasts and the day appointed for the celebration was always previously fixed by the magistrates or priests. Among these were the feriæ latinæ, which were first established by Tarquin, and observed by the consuls regularly, before they set out for the provinces; Compitalia, &c. The feriæ imperativæ, were appointed only by the command of the consul, dictator or prætor, as a public rejoicing for some important victory gained over the enemy of Rome.

Rome. The feriæ Nundinæ, were regular days, in which the people of the country and neighbouring towns assembled together and exposed their respective commodities to sale. They were called Nundinæ because kept every ninth day. The feriæ privatæ, were observed only in families in commemoration of birth days, marriages, funerals and the like. The days on which the feriæ were observed were called by the Romans festi dies, because dedicated to mirth, relaxation, and festivity.

Fescennia, a town of Etruria, where the Fescennine verses were first invented. These verses were a sort of rustic dialogue spoken extempore, in which the actors exposed before their audience the failings and vices of their adversaries, and by a satyrical humor and merriment, endeavoured to raise the laughter of the company. They were often repeated at nuptials and many lascivious expressions were used for the general diversion, as also at harvest-home, when gestures were made adapted to the sense of the unpolished verses that were used. They were proscribed by Augustus as of immoral tendency. Plin. 3, c. 5.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 695.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v 145.

Festus, a friend of Domitian who killed himself in an illness. Martial 1. ep. 79.

Fibrenus, a river of Italy. Sil. 8. v. 400.

Fidena, an inland town of Latium, whose inhabitants are called Fidenates. The place wasconquered by the Romans, B.C. 435. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 773.—Inv. 1, c. 44.

Fidentia, a town of Italy. Cic. In. 2, c. 54.

Ælia Flacilla, the mother of Arcadius, and Honorius was daughter of Antonius, a prefect of Gaul.

Flaminia Lex agraria, by C. Flaminius, the tribune, A. U. C. 525. It required that the lands of Picenum, from which the Gauls Senones had been expelled, should be divided among the Roman people.

Flaminia via, a celebrated road which led from Rome to Ariminum and Aquileia. It received its name from Flaminius, who built it, and was killed at the battle of Thrasymenus against Annibal.

C. Flāmĭnius, a Roman consul of a turbulent disposition, who was drawn into a battle near the lake of Thrasymenus, by the artifice of Annibal. He was killed in the engagement, with an immense number of Romans, B. C. 217. The conqueror wished to give a burial to his body, but it was not found in the heaps of slain. Liv. 22, c. 3, &c.—Polyb.—Flor. 2, c. 6. Val. Max. 1, c. 6.

T. Q. Flāmĭnius or Flaminīnus, a celebrated Roman raised to the consulship, A. U. C. 554. He was trained in the art of war against Annibal, and he shewed himself capable in every respect to discharge with honor the great office with which he was entrusted. He was sent at the head of the Roman troops against Philip, king of Macedonia, and in his expedition he met with uncommon success. The Greeks gradually declared themselves his firmest supporters, and he totally defeated Philip on the confines of Epirus, and made all Locris, Phocis, and Thessaly, tributary to the Roman power. He granted peace to the conquered monarch, and proclaimed all Greece free and independant at the Isthmian games. This celebrated action procured the name of patrons of Greece to the Romans, and insensibly paved their way to universal dominion. Flaminius behaved among them with the greatest policy, and by his ready compliance with their their national customs and prejudices, he gained uncommon popularity, and received the name of father and deliverer of Greece. He was afterwards sent ambassador to king Prusias, who had given refuge to Annabal, and there his prudence and artifice hastened out of the world a man who had long been the terror of the Romans. Flaminius was found dead in his bed, after a life spent in the greatest glory, in which he had imitated with success the virtues of his model Scipio. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor.—Lucius, the brother of the preceding, signalized himself in the wars of Greece. He was expelled from the senate for killing a Gaul, by Cato his brother's colleague in the censorship, an action which was highly resented by Titus. Plut. in Flam.—Calp. Flamma, a tribune, who at the head of 300 men saved the Roman army in Sicily, B. C. 258, by engaging the Carthaginians and cutting them to pieces.

Flavia lex agraria, by L. Flavius, A. U. C. 693, for the distribution of a certain quantity of lands among Pompey's soldiers, and the commons.

Flāviānum, a town of Etruria, on the Tiber, called also Flavinium. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 696.

Flavinia, a town of Latium, which assisted Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 696.

Flavius, a senator who conspired with Piso against Nero, &c. Tacit. —— A tribune of the people deposed by J. Cæsar.—A Roman who informed Gracchus of the violent measures of the senate against him. —A brother of Vespasian, &c.—A tribune who wounded one of Annibal's elephants in an engagement. —A schoolmaster at Rome in the age of Horace. 1 Sat. 6, v. 72.—One of the names of the emperor Domitian. Juv. 4, v. 37.

Flōra, the Goddess of flowers and gardens among the Romans. She is the same as the Chloris of the Greeks. Some suppose that she was originally a common courtezan, who left to the Romans the immense riches which she had acquired by prostitution and lasciviousness, in remembrance of which a yearly festival was instituted in her honor. She was worshipped even among the Sabines, long before the foundation of Rome, and Tatius was the first who raised her a temple in the city of Rome. It is said that she married Zephyrus, and that she received from him the privileges of presiding over flowers, and of enjoying perpetual youth. [Vid. Floralia] She was represented as crowned with flowers, and holding in her hand the horn of plenty. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 195, &c.—Varro de R. R. 1.—Lactant. 1.—A celebrated courtezan passionately loved by Pompey the Great. She was so beautiful, that when the temple of Castor and Pollux at Rome was adorned with paintings, her picture was drawn and placed among the rest. — Another courtezan, &c. Juv. 3, v. 49.

Flōrālia, games in honor of Flora at Rome. They were instituted about the age of Romulus, but they were not celebrated with regularity and proper attention till the year U. C. 580. They were observed yearly, and exhibited a scene of the most unbounded licentiousness. It is reported that Cato wished once to be present at the celebration, and that when he saw that the deference for his presence interrupted the feast, he retired, not chusing to be the spectator of the prostitution of naked women in a public theatre. This behaviour so captivated the Romans, that the venerable senator was treated with the most uncommon applause as he retired. Val. Max. 2, c. 10.—Varro de L. L. 1.—Patere. c. 1.—Plin. 8.

Flōrus, L. Annæus Julius, a Latin historian of the same family which produced Seneca and Lucan A. D. 116. He wrote an abridgement of Roman annals in four books, composed in a florid and poetical stile, and rather a panegyric on many of the great actions of the Romans than a faithful and correct recital of their history. He also wrote poetry, and entered the lists against the emperor Adrian, who satyrically reproached him with frequenting taverns and places of dissipation. The best editions of Florus are Duker's, 2 vols. 8vo. L. Bat. 1722 & 1744; and that of J. Frid. Fischer, 8vo. Lipsi. 1760.—— Julius, a friend of Horace, who accompanied Candius Nero in his military expeditions. The poet has addressed two epistles to him.

Flōriānus, a man who wore the imperial purple at Rome only for two months A. D. 276.

Flūōnia, a surname of Juno.

Folia, a woman of Ariminum, famous for her knowledge of poisonous herbs, and for her petulance. Horat. ep. 5, v. 4.

Fons Solis, a fountain in the province of Cyrene, cool at midday and warm at the rising and setting of the sun. Herod. 4, c. 181.

Fonteia, a vestal virgin. Cic.

Fontius Capito, an intimate friend of Horace. 1, Sat. 5, v. 32.——A Roman who raised commotions in Germany after the death of Nero. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 7.——A man who conducted Cleopatra into Syria by order of Antony. Plut. in Ant.

FORMIÆ, a maritime town of Campania near Caieta. Horat. 3, od. 17.

FORMIANUM, a villa of Cicero near Formiæ. Tacit. Ann. 16, c. 10.

FORNAX, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the baking of bread. Her festivals called Fornacalia were first instituted by Numa. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 525.

FORO APPII, a people of Italy. Plin. 3, c. 5.

FORTUNA, a powerful deity among the antients, daughter of Oceanus according to Homer, or one of the Parcæ according to Pindar. She was the goddess of fortune, and from her hand were derived riches and poverty, pleasures and misfortunes, blessings and pains. She was worshipped in different parts of Greece, and in Achaia her statue held the horn of plenty in one hand, and had a winged Cupid at its feet. In Bœotia she had a statue which represented her as holding Plutus the god of riches in her arms, to intimate that fortune is the source whence wealth and honors flow. Bupalus was the first who made a statue of Fortune for the people of Smyrna, and he represented her with the polar star upon her head, and the horn of plenty in her hand. The Romans paid particular attention to the goddess of Fortune, and had no less than eight different temples erected to her honor in their city. Tullus Hostilius was the first who built her a temple, and from that circumstance it is easily known when her worship was first introduced among the Romans. Her most famous temple in Italy was at Antium, in Latium, where presents and offerings were regularly sent from every part of the country. Fortune has been called Pherepolis, the protectress of cities, Acrea from her temple at Corinth on an eminence, ἀκρος. She was called Prænestine at Prænestæ in Italy, where she had also a temple. Besides she was worshipped among the Romans under different names, such as Female fortune, Virile fortune, Equestrian, Peaceful, Virgin, &c. On the first of April which was consecrated to Venus among the Romans, the Italian widows and marriageable virgins assembled in the temple of Virile fortune, and after burning incense and offering their garments, they intreated the goddess to hide from the eyes of their husbands whatever defects there might be on their bodies. The goddess of Fortune is represented on antient monuments with a horn of plenty, and sometimes two, in her hands. She is blind folded, and generally holds a wheel in her hand as an emblem of her inconstancy. Sometimes she appears with wings, and treads upon the prow of a ship, and holds a rudder in her hands. Dionys. Hal. 4.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 569.—Plut. de fort. Rom. & in Cor.—Cic. de Div. 2.—Liv. 10.—Augustin de Civ. D. 4.—Flor. 2.—Val. Max. 1, c. 5.—Lucan. 2, &c.

FORTUNATÆ INSULÆ, islands in the west of Mauritania in the Atlantic sea. They are supposed to be the Canary Isles of the moderns, thought to be only two in number, at a little distance one from the other, and 10,000 stadia from the shores of Libya. They are represented as the seats of the blessed, where the souls of the virtuous were placed after death. The air was wholesome and temperate, the earth produced an immense number of various fruits without the labors of men. When they had been described to Sertorius in the most enchanting colors, that celebrated general expressed a wish to retire thither, and to remove himself from the noise of the world, and the dangers of war. Strab. 1.—Plut. in Sertor.—Horat. 4, od. 8, v. 27.—Epod. 16.

FŌRŬLI, a town of the Sabines, built on a stony place. Strab. 5.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 714.

Fulginates, a people of Umbria. Plin. 1, c. 4.

Q. Fulginus, a brave officer in Cæsar's legions, &c. Cæs. bell Civ.

Fullinum & Fulginum, a small town of Umbria.

Fulvia lex was proposed but rejected A. U. C. 628, by Flaccus Fulvius. It tended to make all the people of Italy citizens of Rome.

Fulvia, a bold and ambitious woman who married the tribune Clodius, and afterwards Curio, and at last M. Antony. She took a part in all the intrigues of her husband's triumvirate and showed herself cruel as well as revengeful. When Cicero's head had been cut off by order of Antony, Fulvia ordered it to be brought to her, and with all the insolence of barbarity, she bored the orator's tongue with her golden bodkin. Antony divorced her to marry Cleopatra, upon which she attempted to avenge her wrongs, by persuading Augustus to take up arms against her husband. When this scheme did not succeed, she raised a faction against Augustus in which she engaged L. Antonius her brother-in-law, and when all her attempts proved fruitless, she retired into the east, where her husband received her with great coldness and indifference. This unkindness totally broke her heart, and she soon after died, about 40 years before the Christian era. Plut. in Cic. & Anton.——A woman who discovered to Cicero the designs of Catiline upon his life. Plut. in Cic.

Fulvius, a Roman senator, intimate with Augustus. He disclosed the emperor's secrets to his wife who made it public to all the Roman matrons for which he received so severe a reprimand from Augustus, that he and his wife hanged themselves in despair.—A friend of C. Gracchus who was killed in a sedition with his son. His body was thrown into the river, and his widow was forbidden to put on mourning for his death. Plut. in Gracch.

Fulvius Flaccus Censor, a Roman who plundered a marble temple of Juno, to finish the building of one which he had erected to Fortune. He was always unhappy after this sacrilege. Liv. 25, c. 2.

Ser. Fulvius Nobilior, a Roman consul who went to Africa after the defeat of Regulus. After he had acquired much glory against the Carthaginians, he was shipwrecked at his return with 400 Roman ships. His grandson Marcus was sent to Spain, where he greatly signalized himself. He was afterwards rewarded with the consulship.

Fundanus, a lake near Fundi in Italy which discharges itself into the Mediterranean. Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 69.

Fundi, a town of Italy near Caieta, on the Appian road. Strab. 5.

Furiæ, the three daughters of Nox and Acheron, or of Pluto and Proserpine, according to some. Vid. Eumenides.

Furii, a family which migrated from Medullia in Latium and came to settle at Rome under Romulus, and was admitted among the patricians. Camillus was of this family, and it was he who first raised it to distinction. Plut. in Camill.

Furia lex de Testamentis, by C. Furius the tribune. It forbad any person to leave as a legacy more than a thousand asses, except to the relations of the master who manumitted, with a few more exceptions. Cic. 1. Verr. 42.—Liv. 35.

Furina, the goddess of robbers worshipped at Rome. Some say that she is the same as the Furies. Her festivals were called Furinea. Cic. de Nat. 3, c. 8.—Varro de L. L. 5, c. 3.

Furinæ Lacus, a lake near which C. Gracchus was slain.

Furius, a military tribune with Camillus. He was sent against the Tuscans by his colleague.—A Roman slave who obtained his freedom, and applied himself with unremitted attention to cultivate a small portion of land which he had purchased. The uncommon fruits which he reaped from his labors rendered his neighbours jealous of his prosperity. He was accused before a Roman tribunal of witchcraft, but honorably acquitted.

M. Furius Bibaculus, a Latin poet of Cremona, who wrote annals in Anacverse, and was universally celebrated for the wit and humor of his expressions. It is said that Virgil imitated his poetry and even borrowed some of his lines. Horace however has not failed to ridicule his verses. Quintil. 8, c. 6, &c.—Horat. 2, Sat. 5, v. 40.

Furnius, a man accused of adultery with Claudia Pulchra, and condemned, &c. Tacit. Hist. 4, v. 52.——A friend of Horace, who was consul and distinguished himself by his elegant historical writings. 1 Sat. 10, v. 36.

G A

GABINIUS, a Roman historian.——Aulus, a Roman consul, who made war in Judæa, and re-established tranquillity there. He suffered himself to be bribed, and replaced Ptolemy Aulætes on the throne of Egypt. He was accused, at his return, of receiving bribes. Cicero, at the request of Pompey, ably defended him. He was banished, and died about 40 years before Christ, at Salona.——A lieutenant of Antony.——A consul, who behaved with uncommon rudeness to Cicero.

GADES & GADIRA, a small island in the Atlantic, on the Spanish coast, 25 miles from the columns of Hercules. It was sometimes called Tartessus and Erythia, according to Pliny, and is now known by the name of Cadiz. Geryon, whom Hercules killed, fixed his residence there. Hercules, surnamed Gaditanus, had there a celebrated temple, in which all his labors were engraved with excellent workmanship. The inhabitants are called Gaditani. Plin. 4, c. 22.——Strab. 3.——Cic. pro Gab.——Justin. 44, c. 4.

GÆTULIA, a country of Libya, near the Garamantes, which formed part of king Masinissa's kingdom. The country was the favorite retreat of wild beasts, and is now called Bildulgerid. Sallust. in Jug.——Sil. 3, v. 287.

GÆTULICUS, Cn. Lentulus, an officer in the age of Tiberius, &c. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 42.

GALÆBRII, a nation near Thrace.

GALACTOPHÆGI, a people of Asiatic Scythia. Homer. Il. 3.

GALÆSUS. Vid. Galesus.

GALANTHIS, a servant maid of Alcmena, whose sagacity eased the labors of her mistress. When Juno resolved to retard the birth birth of Hercules, and hasten the labors of the wife of Sthenelus, she solicited the aid of Lucina; who immediately repaired to the house of Alcmena, and in the form of an old woman, sat near the door with her legs crossed, and her fingers joined. In this posture she uttered those magical words, which served also to protract the labors of Alcmena, and render her state the more miserable. Alcmena had already passed some days in the most excruciating torments, when Galanthis began to suspect the jealousy of Juno; and concluded that the old woman, who continued at the door always in the same unchanged posture, was the instrument of the anger of the goddess. With such suspicions Galanthis ran out of the house, and with a countenance expressive of joy, she informed the old woman that her mistress had just brought forth. Lucina, at the words, rose from her posture, and at that instant Alcmena was safely delivered. The uncommon laugh which Galanthis raised upon this, made Lucina suspect that she had been deceived. She seized Galanthis by the hair, and threw her on the ground; and while she attempted to resist she was changed into a weasel, and condemned to bring forth her young by the mouth in the most agonizing pains. This transformation alludes to a vulgar notion among the antients, who believed this of the weasel, because she carries her young in her mouth, and continually shifts from place to place. The Bœotians paid great veneration to the weasel, which, as they supposed, facilitated the labors of Alcmena. Ælian. H. Anim. 2.—Ovid. Met. 9, fab. 6.

GALATA, a town of Syria.——An island near Sicily.——A town of Sicily.——A mountain of Phocis.

GALATÆ, the inhabitants of Galatia. Vid. Galatia.

GALATEA & GALATHEA, a sea nymph, daughter of Nereus and Doris. She was passionately loved by the Cyclops Polyphemus, whom she treated with coldness and disdain; while Acis, a shepherd of Sicily, enjoyed her unbounded affection. The happiness of these two lovers was disturbed by the jealousy of the Cyclops, who crushed his rival to pieces with a piece of a broken rock, while he sat in the bosom of Galatæa. Galatæa was inconsolable for the loss of Acis; and as she could not restore him to life, she changed him into a fountain. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 789.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 103. ——The daughter of a Celtic king, from whom the Gauls were called Galatæ. Aminian. 15.——A country girl, &c. Virg. Ecl. 3.

GALATIA, a country of Asia Minor, between Phrygia, the Euxine, Cappadocia, and Bithynia. It received its name from the Gauls, who migrated there [illegible] nus, some time after the [illegible] Strab. 12.—Justin. 25, c. 4.——The [illegible] of ancient Gaul among the Greeks.

GALAXIA, a festival, in which [illegible] boiled a mixture of barley, [illegible] called Theoxenia by the Greeks.

GALBA, a surname of one of the [illegible] from the smallness of his stature, [illegible] among the Gauls, who made war against Cæsar. Cæs. Bell. Gall. 2, c. 4.——[illegible] brother of the emperor Galba, who killed himself, &c.——A mean buffoon, in the time of Tiberius. Juv. 8, v. 4.——Servius, a lawyer at Rome, who defended the cause of adulterers with great warmth, as being one of the fraternity. Horace ridicules him. 1 Sat. 2, v. 46.

GALBA, Servius Sulpicius, a Roman, rose gradually to the greatest offices of state, and exercised his power in the provinces with equity and unremitted diligence. He dedicated the greatest part of his time to solitary pursuits, chiefly to avoid the suspicions of Nero. His disapprobation of the emperor's oppressive commands in the provinces, was the cause of his disgrace. Nero ordered him to be put to death, but he escaped from the hands of the executioner, and was publicly saluted emperor. When he was seated on the throne, he suffered himself to be governed by favorites, and imposed the goods of the citizens to gratify their avarice. Exemptions were sold at a high price, and the crime of murder was blotted out, and impunity purchased with a large sum of money. Such irregularities in the emperor's measures displeased the people; and when the soldiers refused to pay the soldiers the money which he had promised them, when he was raised to the throne, they assassinated him in the 73d year of his age, and in the eighth month of his reign, and proclaimed Otho emperor in his room, January 16th, A. D. 69. The virtues which had shone so bright in him when a private man, totally disappeared when he ascended the throne; and he soon shewed himself the most imperious tyrant, forgot the duties of an emperor, and the father of his people. Sueton. & Plutarch.—Tacit.——A learned man, father to the emperor of the same name. Suet. in Galb. 2.——A Roman famed for his eloquence, in the age of Cato, &c.

GALENUS CLAUDIUS, a celebrated physician in the age of M. Antonine and his successors, born at Pergamus, the son of an architect. He applied himself with unremitted labor to the study of physic, mathematics, and chiefly of physic. He visited the most learned seminaries of [illegible]

GALERIUS, a native of Dacia, made emperor of Rome, by Diocletian. Vid. Maximianus.

GALESUS, a river of Calabria, flowing into the bay of Tarentum. The poets have celebrated it for the shady groves in its neighbourhood, and the fine sheep which feed on its fertile banks. Virg. G. 4, v. 126.—Horat. 2, od. 6, v. 10.——A rich prince of Latium, killed as he attempted to make a reconciliation between the Trojans and Rutulians, when Ascanius had killed the favorite stag of Tyrrheus; which was the ground of all the enmities between the two nations. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 535.

GALILÆA, a celebrated country of Syria.

GALINTHIADIA, a festival at Thebes, in honour of Galinthias, a daughter of Proetus. It was celebrated before the festival of Hercules, by whose orders it was first instituted.

GALLI, a nation of Europe, naturally brave, and inclined to war. They were very superstitious; and in their sacrifices often immolated human victims. In some places, they had large statues made with twigs, which they filled with men, and reduced to ashes. They believed themselves descended from Pluto; and from that circumstance they always reckoned their time, not by the days, as other nations, but by the nights. Their obsequies were splendid; and not only the most precious things, but even slaves and animals were burnt on the funeral piles. Children, running, dancing, naked, appeared in the processions of the festivals, before they were able to bear arms in the defence of their country. Cæsar. Strabo. Tacit.—Vid. Gallinthias.—The priests of Cybele, who received their name from the river Gallus, in Phrygia, where they celebrated the festivals. They mutilated themselves, before they were admitted to the priesthood, in imitation of Attys, the favorite of Cybele. (Vid. Attys.) The chief among them was called Archigallus, Vid. Corybantes, Dactyli, &c.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Fast. 4. v. 361.—Lucan. 1, v. 466.—Lucian de Dea Syria.

GALLIA, a large country of Europe, called Gaulis by the Greeks. The inhabitants were called Galli, Celtæ, Celtiberi, and Celtoscythæ. Ancient Gaul was divided into four different parts by the Romans, called Gallia Belgica, Narbonensis, Aquitania, and Celtica. Gallia Belgica, was the largest province bounded by Germany, Gallia Narbonensis, and the German ocean; and contained the modern country of Alsace, Lorraine, Picardy, with part of the Low Countries, and of Champagne, and of the isle of France. Gallia Narbonensis, which contained the provinces now called Languedoc, Provence, Dauphiné, Savoy, was bounded by the Alps and Pyrenean mountains, by Aquitania, Belgium and the Mediterranean. Aquitania Gallia, now called the provinces of Poitou, Saintonge, Guienne, Berry, Limosin, Gascogny, Auvergne, &c. was situate between the Garumna, the Pyrenean mountains and the ocean. Gallia Celtica, or Lugdunensis, was bounded by Belgium, Gallia Narbonensis, the Alps, and the ocean. It contained the country at present known by the name of Lyonnois, Touraine, Franche Comté, Senonois, Switzerland, and part of Normandy. Besides these grand divisions, there is often mention made of Gallia Cisalpina, or Citerior; Transalpina or Ulterior, which refers to that part of Italy which was conquered by some of the Gauls, who crossed the Alps. By Gallia Cisalpina, the Romans understood that part of Gaul which lies in Italy; and by Transalpina, that which lies beyond the Alps, in regard only to the inhabitants of Rome. Gallia Cispadana, and Transpadana, is applied to a part of Italy, conquered by some of the Gauls, and then it means the country on this side of the Po, or beyond the Po, with respect to Rome. By Gallia Togata, the Romans understood Cisalpine Gaul, where the Roman gowns, togæ, were usually worn. Gallia Narbonensis, was called Bracata, on account of the peculiar covering of the inhabitants for their thighs. The epithet of Comata, is applied to Gallia Celtica, because the people suffered, ſuffered their hair to grow to an uncommon length. The inhabitants were great warriors; and their valor overcame the Roman armies, took the cities of Rome and invaded Greece, in different ages. They ſpread themſelves over the greateſt part of the world. They were very ſuperſtitious in their religious ceremonies, and revered the ſacerdotal order, as if they had been gods. (Vid. Druides.) They long maintained a bloody war againſt the Romans; and Cæſar reſided 10 years in their country, before he could totally ſubdue them. Cæſ. bell. Gall. —Perſ. 7, c. 6.—Strab. 5, &c.

GALLICĀNUS MONS, a mountain of Campania.

GALLIĒNUS, Publ. Lucinius, a ſon of the emperor Valerian. He reigned conjointly with his father for ſeven years, and aſcended the throne as ſole emperor, A. D. 260. In his youth, he ſhowed his activity and military character, in an expedition againſt the Germans and Sarmatæ; but when he came to the purple, he delivered himſelf up to pleaſure and indolence. His time was ſpent in the greateſt debauchery; and he indulged himſelf in the groſſeſt and moſt laſcivious manner, and his palace diſplayed a ſcene, at once, of effeminacy and ſhame, voluptuouſneſs and immorality. He often appeared with his hair powdered with golden duſt; and enjoyed tranquillity at home, while his provinces abroad were torn by civil quarrels and ſeditions. He heard of the loſs of a rich province, and of the execution of a malefactor, with the ſame indifference; and when he was apprized that Egypt had revolted, he only obſerved, that he could live without the produce of Egypt. He was of a diſpoſition naturally inclined to raillery and the ridicule of others. When his wife had been deceived by a jeweller, Gallienus ordered the malefactor to be placed in the circus, in expectation of being expoſed to the ferocity of a lion. While the wretch trembled at the expectation of inſtant death, the executioner, by order of the emperor, let looſe a capon upon him. An uncommon laugh was raiſed upon this, and the emperor obſerved, that he who had deceived others, ſhould expect to be deceived himſelf. In the midſt of theſe ridiculous diverſions, Gallienus was alarmed by the revolt of two of his officers, who had aſſumed the imperial purple. This intelligence rouſed him from his lethargy; he marched againſt his antagoniſts, and put all the rebels to the ſword, without ſhowing the leaſt favor either to rank, ſex, or age. Theſe cruelties irritated the people and the army; emperors were elected, and no leſs than thirty tyrants aſpired to the imperial purple. Gallienus reſolved boldly to oppoſe his adverſaries; but in the midſt of his preparations, he was aſſaſſinated at Milan by ſome of his officers, in the 50th year of his age, A. D. 268.

GALLINARIA SYLVA, a wood near Cumæ in Italy, famous as being the retreat of robbers. Juv. 3, v. 307.

GALLIPŎLIS, a fortified town of the Salentines, on the Ionian ſea.

GALLOGRÆCIA, a country of Aſia minor, near Bithynia and Cappadocia. It was inhabited by a colony of Gauls, who aſſumed the name of Gallogræci, becauſe a number of Greeks had acompanied them in their emigration. Strab. 2.

C. GALLŌNIUS, a Roman knight appointed over Gades, &c.

Antony, &c. ——Caius, a friend of the great Africanus, famous for his knowledge of aſtronomy, and his exact calculations of eclipſes. Cic. de Senect.——Ælius, the 3d governor of Egypt in the age of Auguſtus.——Cornelius, a Roman knight, who rendered himſelf famous by his poetical, as well as military talents. He was paſſionately fond of the ſlave Lycoris or Cytheris, and celebrated her beauty in his poetry. She proved ungrateful, and forſook him to follow M. Antony, which gave occaſion to Virgil to write his tenth eclogue. Gallus, as well as the other poets of his age, was in the favor of Auguſtus, by whom he was appointed over Egypt. He became forgetful of the favors he received; he pillaged the province, and even conſpired againſt his benefactor, according to ſome accounts, for which he was baniſhed by the emperor. This diſgrace operated ſo powerfully upon him, that he killed himſelf in deſpair, A. D. 26. Some few fragments remain of his poetry, and it ſeems that he particularly excelled in elegiac compoſition. It is ſaid, that Virgil wrote an eulogium on his poetical friend, and inſerted it at the end of his Georgics; but that he totally ſuppreſſed it, for fear of offending his imperial patron, of whoſe favors Gallus had ſhown himſelf ſo undeſerving, and inſtead of that he ſubſtituted the beautiful epiſode about Ariſtæus and Eurydice. This eulogium, according to ſome, was ſuppreſſed at the particular deſire of Auguſtus. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Virg. Ecl. 6, & 10.—Ovid. Amat. 3, el. 15, v. 29.—— Vibius Gallus, a celebrated orator of Gaul, in the age of Auguſtus, of whoſe orations Seneca has preſerved ſome fragments.——A Roman, who aſſaſſinated Decius, the emperor, and raiſed himſelf to the throne. He showed himself indolent and cruel, and beheld with the greatest indifference the revolt of his provinces, and the invasion of his empire by the barbarians. He was at last assassinated by his soldiers, A. D. 253.——Flavius Claudius Constantinus, a brother of the emperor Julian, raised to the imperial throne under the title of Cæsar, by Constantius his relation. He conspired against his benefactor, and was publicly condemned to be beheaded, A. D. 354.——A small river of Phrygia.

Ganymede, a goddess, better known by the name of Hebe. Paus. 2, c. 13.

Ganymedes, a beautiful youth of Phrygia, son of Tros, and brother to Ilus and Assaracus. According to Lucian, he was son of Dardanus. He was taken up to heaven by Jupiter as he was hunting, or rather tending his father's flocks on mount Ida, and he became the cup-bearer of the gods in the place of Hebe. Some say that he was carried away by an eagle, to satisfy the shameful and unnatural desires of Jupiter. He is generally represented sitting on the back of a flying eagle in the air. Paus. 5, c. 24.—Homer. Il. 20.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 252.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 155.—Horat. 4, od. 4.

Gebenna, a town and mountain of Gaul. Lucan. 1, v. 435.

Gedrosia, a barren province of Persia. Strab. 2.

GEGANIA, a family of Alba, part of which migrated to Rome, under Romulus. One of the daughters called Gegania was the first of the vestals created by Numa. Plut. in Num.

GELA, a town on the southern parts of Sicily, about 10 miles from the sea, according to Ptolemy, which received its name from a small river in the neighbourhood, called Gelas. It was built by a Rhodian and Cretan colony, 713 years before the Christian era. After it had continued in existence 404 years, Phintias, tyrant of Agrigentum, carried the inhabitants to Phintias, a town in the neighbourhood, which he had founded, and he employed the stones of Gela to beautify his own city. Phintias was also called Gela. The inhabitants were called Gelenses, Geloi, and Gelani. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 702.—Paus. 8, c. 46.

AULUS Gellius, a Roman grammarian in the age of M. Antoninus, about 130 A. D. He published a work which he called Noctes Atticæ, because he composed it at Athens, during the long nights of the winter. It is a collection of incongruous matter, which contains many fragments from the ancient writers, and often serves to explain antique monuments. It was originally composed for the improvement of his children, and abounds with many grammatical remarks. The best editions of A. Gellius are, that of Gronovius, 4to, L. Bat. 1706, and that of Conrad. 2 vols. 8vo. Lipsi. 1762.

GELO & GELON, a son of Dinomenes, who made himself absolute at Syracuse, 491 years before the Christian era. He conquered the Carthaginians at Himera, and made his oppression popular by his great equity and moderation. He reigned seven years, and his death was universally lamented at Syracuse. He was called the father of his people, and the patron of liberty, and honored as a demi-god. His brother Hiero succeeded him. Paus. 8, c. 42. —Herodot. 7, c. 153, &c.—Diod. 11.——A man who attempted to poison Pyrrhus——A governor of Bœotia.——A son of Hiero the younger. Paus. 6, c. 9.——A general of Phocis, destroyed with his troops by the Thessalians. Paus. 10, c. 1.

GENUTIA LEX, de magistratibus, by L. Genutius the tribune, A. U. C. 411. It ordained that no person should exercise the same magistracy within ten years, or be invested with two offices in one year.

GEORGICA, a poem of Virgil in four books.

books. The first treats of ploughing the ground; the second of sowing it; the third speaks of the management of cattle, &c. and in the fourth, the poet gives an account of bees, and of the manner of keeping them among the Romans. The word is derived from γεα terra and εργον opus, because it particularly treats of husbandry. The work is dedicated to Mæcenas the great patron of poetry, in the age of Virgil. The author was seven years in writing and polishing it, and in that composition he showed how much he excelled all other writers. He imitated Hesiod who wrote a poem nearly on the same subject, called Opera, & Dies.

Gephyra, one of the cities of the Seleucidæ in Syria. Strab. 9.

Gephyræi, a people of Phœnicia, who passed with Cadmus into Bœotia, and from thence into Attica. Herodot. 5, v. 57.

Gergithum, a town near Cumæ in Æolia. Plin. 5, c. 30.

Gergobia, a town of Gaul.

Gerion, an ancient augur.

Germania, an extensive country of Europe, at the east of Gaul. Its inhabitants were warlike, fierce, and uncivilized, and always proved a watchful enemy against the Romans. Cæsar first entered their country, but he rather checked their fury than conquered them. His example was followed by his imperial successors or their generals, who sometimes entered the country to chastise the insolence of the inhabitants. The ancient Germans were very superstitious, and, in many instances, their religion was the same as that of their neighbours, the Gauls; whence some have concluded that these two nations were of the same origin. They paid uncommon respect to their women, whom, as they believed, were endowed with something more than human. They built no temples to their gods, and paid great attention to the heroes and warriors which their country had produced. Their rude institutions, gradually gave rise to the laws and manners which still prevail in the countries of Europe, which their arms invaded or conquered. Tacitus, in whose age even letters were unknown among them, observed their customs with nicety, and has delineated them with the genius of an historian, and the reflection of a philosopher. Tacit. de Morib. Germ.—Mela. 1, c. 3, l. 3, c. 3. —Cæs. Bell. G.

Germanicus Cæsar, a son of Drusus and Antonia, the niece of Augustus. He was adopted by his uncle Tiberius, and raised to the most important offices of the state. When his grandfather Augustus died, he was employed in a war in Germany, and the affection of the soldiers unanimously saluted him emperor. He refused the unseasonable honor, and appeased the tumult which his indifference occasioned. He continued his wars in Germany, and defeated the celebrated Arminius, and was rewarded with a triumph at his return in Rome. Tiberius declared him emperor of the east, and sent him to appease the seditions of the Armenians. But the success of Germanicus in the east, was soon looked upon with an envious eye by Tiberius, and his death was meditated. He was secretly poisoned at Daphne near Antioch by Piso, A. D. 19, in the 34th year of his age. The news of his death, was received with the greatest grief, and the most bitter lamentations, and Tiberius seemed to be the only one who rejoiced in the fall of Germanicus. He had married Agrippina, by whom he had nine children, one of whom, Caligula, disgraced the name of his illustrious father. Germanicus has been commended, not only for his military accomplishments, but also for his learning, humanity, and extensive benevelence. In the midst of war, he devoted some moments to study, and he favored the world with two Greek comedies, some epigrams, and a translation of Aratus in Latin verse. Sueton.——This name was common in the age of the emperors, not only to those who had obtained victories over the Germans, but even to those who had entered the borders of their country at the head of an army.

Germanii, a people of Persia. Herodot. 1, c. 125.

Gerræ, a people of Scythia, in whose country the Borysthenes rises. The kings of Scythia were generally buried in their territories. Id. 4, c. 71.

Geras & Gerrhus, a river of Scythia. Id. 4, c. 56.

Gerontheræ, a town of Laconia, where a yearly festival, called Geronthæa, was observed in honor of Mars. The god had there a temple, with a grove, into which no woman was permitted to enter, during the time of the solemnity. Paus. Lacon.

Geryon & Geryones, a celebrated monster, born from the union of Chrysaor with Callirhoe, and represented by the poets as having three bodies and three heads. He lived in the island of Gades, where he kept numerous flocks, which were guarded by a two headed dog, called Orthos, and by Eurythion. Hercules, by order of Eurystheus, went to Gades, and destroyed Geryon, Orthos, and Eurythion, and carried away all his flocks and herds to Tirynthus. Hesiod. Theog. 187.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 661, l. 8, v. 202.—Ital. 1, v. 277.

GESSATÆ, a people of Gallia Togata. Plut. in Marcel.

GESSUS, a river of Ionia.

GETA, a man who raised seditions at Rome in Nero's reign, &c. Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 72.——Septimius, a son of the emperor Severus, brother to Caracalla. In the eighth year of his age, he was moved with compassion at the fate of some of the partizans of Niger and Albinus, who had been ordered to be executed; and his father, struck with his humanity, retracted his sentence. After his father's death he reigned at Rome, conjointly with his brother; but Caracalla, who envied his virtues, and was jealous of his popularity, ordered him to be poisoned; and when this could not be effected, he murdered him in the arms of his mother Julia, who in the attempt of defending the fatal blows from his body, received a wound in her arm, from the hand of her son, the 28th of March, A. D. 212. Geta had not reached the 23d year of his age, and the Romans had reason to lament the death of so virtuous a prince, while they groaned under the cruelties and oppression of Caracalla.

GETÆ, a people of European Scythia, near the Daci. Ovid, who was banished in their country, describes them as a savage and warlike nation. Ovid. de Pont. Trist. 5. el. 7, v. 111.—Strab. 7.

GETULIA, Vid. Gætulia.

GIGANTES, the sons of Cœlus and Terra, who, according to Hesiod, sprang from the blood of the wound which Cœlus received from his son Saturn; whilst Hyginus calls them sons of Tartarus and Terra. They are represented as men of uncommon stature, with strength proportioned to their gigantic size. Some of them, as Cottus, Briareus, and Gyges, had 50 heads and 100 arms, and serpents instead of legs. They were of a terrible aspect, their hair hung loose about their shoulders, and their beard was suffered to grow untouched. Pallene, and its neighbourhood, was the place of their residence. The defeat of the Titans, to whom they were nearly related, incensed them against Jupiter, and they all conspired to dethrone him. The god was alarmed, and called all the deities to assist him against a powerful enemy, who made use of rocks, oaks, and burning woods for their weapons, and who had already heaped mount Ossa upon Pelion, to scale with more facility the walls of heaven. At the sight of such dreadful adversaries, the gods fled with the greatest consternation into Egypt, where they assumed the shape of different animals, to screen themselves from their pursuers. Jupiter, however, remembered that they were not invincible, provided he called a mortal to his assistance; and by the advice of Pallas, he armed his son Hercules in his cause. With the aid of this celebrated hero, the giants were soon put to flight and defeated. Some were crushed to pieces under mountains, or buried in the sea; and others were flead alive, or beaten to death with clubs. (Vid. Enceladus, Aloides, Porphyrion, Typhon, Otus, Titanes, &c.) The existence of giants has been supported by all the writers of antiquity, and received as an undeniable truth. Homer tells us, that Tityus, when extended on the ground, covered nine acres; and that Polyphemus eat two of the companions of Ulysses at once, and walked along the shores of Sicily, leaning on a staff, which might have served for the mast of a ship. The Grecian heroes, during the Trojan war, and Turnus in Italy, attacked their enemies by throwing stones, which four men of the succeeding ages would be unable to move. Plutarch also mentions, in support of the gigantic stature, that Sertorius opened the grave of Antæus in Africa, and found a skeleton, which measured sixty cubits in length. Apollod. 1, c. 6.—Paus. 8, c. 2, &c.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 151.—Plut. in Sertor.—Hygin. fab. 28, &c.—Homer. od. 7, & 10.—Virg. G. 1, v. 280, &c.

GIGARTUM, a town of Phœnicia.

GIGIS, one of the female attendants of Paryſatis, who was privy to the poisoning of Statira. Plut. in Artax.

GILDO, a governor of Africa, in the reign of Arcadius. He died A. D. 398.

GILLO, an infamous adulterer, in Juvenal's age. Juv. 1, v. 40.

GINDANES, a people of Lybia, who feed on the leaves of the lotus. Herodot. 4, c. 176.

GINDES, a river of Albania, flowing into the Cyrus.——Another of Mesopotamia. Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 141.

GINGI. Vid. Gigis.

GINGUNUM, a mountain of Umbria.

GIPPIUS, a Roman, who pretended to sleep, that his wife might indulge her adulterous propensities, &c.

GISCO, son of Hamilcon the Carthaginian general, was banished from Carthage, by the influence of his enemies. He was afterwards recalled, and impowered by the Carthaginians to punish in what manner he pleased, those who had occasioned his banishment. He was satisfied to see them prostrate on the ground, and to place his foot on their neck, shewing that independence and forgiveness are two of the most brilliant virtues of a great mind. He was made a general general ſoon after, in Sicily, againſt the Corinthians, about 309 years before the Chriſtian era; and by his ſucceſs and intrepidity, he obliged the enemies of his country to ſue for peace.

GLADIATORII LUDI, combats originally exhibited on the grave of deceaſed perſons at Rome. They were firſt introduced at Rome by the Bruti, upon the death of their father, A. U. C. 488. It was ſuppoſed that the ghoſts of the dead were rendered propitious by human blood, therefore at funerals, it was uſual to murder ſlaves in cool blood. In ſucceeding ages, it was reckoned leſs cruel to oblige them to kill one another like men, than to ſlaughter them like brutes, therefore the barbarity was covered by the ſpecious ſhow of pleaſure and voluntary combat. Originally captives, criminals, or diſobedient ſlaves, were trained up for combat; but when the diverſion became more frequent, and was exhibited on the ſmalleſt occaſion, to procure eſteem and popularity, many of the Roman citizens enliſted themſelves among the gladiators, and Nero at one ſhow, exhibited no leſs than 400 ſenators and 600 knights. The people were treated with theſe combats, not only by the great and opulent, but the very prieſts had their Ludi pontificales, and Ludi ſacerdotales. It is ſuppoſed that there were no more than three pair of gladiators exhibited by the Bruti. Their numbers, however, increaſed with the luxury and power of the city; and the gladiators became ſo formidable, that Spartacus, one of their body, had courage to take up arms, and the ſucceſs to defeat the Roman armies, only with a train of his fellow-ſufferers. The more prudent of the Romans, were ſenſible of the dangers which threatened the ſtate, by keeping ſuch a number of deſperate men in arms, and therefore, many ſalutary laws were propoſed to limit their number, as well as to ſettle the time in which the ſhow could be exhibited with ſafety and convenience. Under the emperors, not only ſenators and knights, but even women engaged among the gladiators, and ſeemed to forget the inferiority of their ſex. When there were to be any ſhows, hand-bills were circulated to give notice to the people, and to mention the place, number, time, and every circumſtance requiſite to be known. When they were firſt brought upon the arena, they walked round the place with great pomp and ſolemnity, and after that they were matched in equal pairs with great nicety. They firſt had a ſkirmiſh with wooden files, called rudes or arma luſoria. After this the effective weapons, ſuch as ſwords, daggers, &c. called arma decretoria were given them, and the ſignal for the engagement was given by the ſound of a trumpet. As they had all previouſly ſworn to fight till death, or ſuffer death in the moſt excruciating torments, the fight was bloody and obſtinate, and when one ſignified his ſubmiſſion by ſurrendering his arms, the victor was not permitted to grant him his life, without the leave and approbation of the multitude. This was done by clenching the fingers of both hands between each other, and holding the thumbs upright cloſe together, or by bending back their thumbs. The firſt of theſe was called pollicem premere, and ſignified the wiſh of the people to ſpare the life of the conquered. The other ſign, called pollicem vertere, ſignified their diſapprobation, and ordered the victor to put his antagoniſt to death. The victor was generally rewarded with a palm, and other expreſſive marks of the people's favor. He was moſt commonly preſented with a pileus and rudis. When one of the combatants received a remarkable wound, the people exclaimed habet, and expreſſed their concern by ſhouts. The combats of gladiators, were ſometimes different, either in weapons or dreſs, whence they were generally diſtinguiſhed into the following orders: The ſecutores were armed with a ſword and buckler, to keep off the net of their antagoniſts, the retiarii. Theſe laſt endeavoured to throw their net over the head of their antagoniſt, and in that manner to entangle him, and prevent him from ſtriking. If this did not ſucceed, they betook themſelves to flight. Their dreſs was a ſhort coat with a hat tied under the chin with broad ribbon. They wore a trident in their left hand. The Threces, originally Thracians, were armed with a faulchion, and ſmall round ſhield. The myrmillones, called alſo Galli, from their Gallic dreſs, were much the ſame as the ſecutores. They were, like them, armed with a ſword, and on the top of their head-piece, they wore the figure of a fiſh embоſſed, called μορμυρος, whence their name. The Hoplomachi, were completely armed from head to foot, as their name implies. The Samnites, armed after the manner of the Samnites, wore a large ſhield broad at the top, and growing more narrow at the bottom, more conveniently to defend the upper parts of the body. The Eſſedarii, generally fought from the eſſedum, or chariot uſed by the ancient Gauls and Britons. The andabatæ ανδαβαται, fought on horſeback, with a helmet that covered and defended their faces and eyes. Hence andabatarum more pugnare, is to fight blindfolded. The meridiani, engaged in the afternoon. The poſtulatitii, were men of great ſkill and experience, and ſuch as were generally produced by the emperors. The fiscales were maintained out of the emperor's treasury, fisci. The dimachæri fought with two swords in their hands, whence their name. After these cruel exhibitions had been continued for the amusement of the Roman populace, they were abolished by Constantine the Great, near 600 years after their first institution. They were, however, revived under the reign of Constantius and his two successors, but Honorius for ever put an end to these cruel barbarities.

Glanis, a river of Cumæ.—Of Iberia.—Of Italy. Ital. 8, v. 454.

Glaphyre & Glaphyra, a daughter of Archelaus the high-priest of Bellona in Cappadocia, celebrated for her beauty and intrigues. She obtained the kingdom of Cappadocia for her two sons from M. Antony, whom she corrupted by defiling the bed of her husband. This amour of Antony with Glaphyra, highly displeased his wife Fulvia, who wished Augustus to avenge his infidelity, by receiving from her the same favors which Glaphyra received from Antony.—Her grand daughter bore the same name. She was a daughter of Archelaus king of Cappadocia, and married Alexander, a son of Herod, by whom she had two sons. After the death of Alexander, she married her brother-in-law Archelaus.

Glaucus, a son of Hippolochus, the son of Bellerophon. He assisted Priam in the Trojan war, and had the simplicity to exchange his golden suit of armour with Diomedes for an iron one, whence came the proverb of Glauci et Diomedis permutatio, to express a foolish purchase. He behaved with much courage, and was killed by Ajax. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 483.—Martial. 9, ep. 96.—Homer. Il. 6.——A fisherman of Anthedon in Bœotia, son of Neptune and Nais, or according to others of Polybius the son of Mercury. As he was fishing, he observed that all the fishes which he laid on the grass received fresh vigor as they touched the ground, and immediately escaped from him by leaping into the sea. He attributed the cause of it to the grass, and by tasting it, he found himself suddenly moved with a desire of living in the sea. Upon this he leaped into the water, and was made a sea deity by Oceanus and Tethys, at the request of the gods. After this transformation, he became enamoured of the Nereid Scylla, whose ingratitude was severely punished by Circe. [Vid. Scylla.] He is represented like the other sea deities with a long beard, dishevelled hair, and shaggy eyebrows, and with the tail of a fish. He received the gift of prophecy from Apollo, and according to some accounts he was the interpreter of Nereus. He assisted the Argonauts in their expedition, and foretold them that Hercules and the two sons of Leda, would one day receive immortal honors. The fable of his metamorphosis has been explained by some authors, who observe that he was an excellent diver, who was devoured by fishes as he was swimming in the sea. *Ovid. He prevented his mares from having any commerce with the stallions, in the expectation that they would become swifter in running, upon which Venus inspired the mares with such fury, that they tore his body to pieces as he returned from the games, which Adrastus had celebrated in honor of his father. He was buried near Potnia. Hygin. fab. 250. Virg. G. 3, v. 367.—Apollod. 1 & 2.——A son of Minos the 2d, and Pasiphae, who was smothered in a cask of honey. His father ignorant of his fate consulted the oracle to know where he was, and received for answer, that the soothsayer who best described him an ox, which was of three different colors among his flocks, would best give him intelligence of his son's situation. Polyidus was found superior to all the other soothsayers, and was commanded by the king to find the young prince. When he had found him, Minos confined him with the dead body, and told him that he never would recover his liberty, if he did not restore him to life. Polyidus was struck with the king's severity, but while he stood in astonishment, a serpent suddenly came towards the body and touched it. Polyidus killed the serpent, and immediately a second came, who seeing the other without motion or signs of life, disappeared, and soon after returned with a certain herb in his mouth. This herb he laid on the body of the dead serpent, who was immediately restored to life. Polyidus who had attentively considered what passed, seized the herb, and and with it he rubbed the body of the dead prince who was inſtantly raiſed to life. Minos received Glaucus with gratitude, but he refuſed to reſtore Polyidus to liberty, before he taught his ſon the art of divination and prophecy. He conſented with great reluctance, and when he was at laſt permitted to return to Argolis his native country, he deſired his pupil to ſpit in his mouth. Glaucus willingly conſented, and from that moment he forgot all the knowledge of divination and healing, which he had received from the inſtructions of Polyidus. Hyginus aſcribes the recovery of Glaucus to Æſculapius. Apollod. 2, c. 3.—Hygin. 136 & 251, &c.——A ſon of Epytus, who ſucceeded his father on the throne of Meſſenia, about 10 centuries before the Auguſtan age. GORDIĀNUS, M. Antonius Africanus, a ſon of Metius Marcellus, deſcended from Trajan, by his mother's ſide. In the greateſt affluence he cultivated learning, and was an example of piety and virtue. He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of poetry, and compoſed a poem in 30 books upon the virtues of Titus Antoninus, and M. Aurelius. He was ſuch an advocate for good breeding and politeneſs, that he never ſat down in the preſence of his father-in-law, Annius Severus, who paid him daily viſits, before he was promoted to the pretorſhip. He was ſometime after elected conſul, and went to take the government of Africa, in the capacity of proconſul. After he had attained his 80th year, in the greateſt ſplendor and domeſtic tranquillity, he was rouſed from his peaceful occupations by the tyrannical reign of the Maximini, and he was proclaimed emperor by the rebellious troops of his province. He long declined to accept the imperial purple, but the threats of immediate death gained his compliance. Maximinus marched againſt him with the greateſt indignation; and Gordian ſent his ſon, with whom he ſhared the imperial dignity, to oppoſe the enemy. Young Gordian was killed; killed; and the father, worn out with age, and grown desperate on account of his misfortunes, strangled himself at Carthage, before he had been six weeks at the head of the empire, A. D. 236. He was universally lamented by the army and people.——M. Antonius Africanus, son of Gordianus, was instructed by Serenus Samnoticus, who left him his library, which consisted of 62,000 volumes. His enlightened understanding, and his peaceful disposition, recommended him to the favor of the emperor Heliogabalus. He was made prefect of Rome, and afterwards consul, by the emperor Alexander Severus. He passed into Africa, in the character of lieutenant to his father, who had obtained that province; and seven years after he was elected emperor, in conjunction with him. He marched against the partizans of Maximinus, his antagonist in Mauritania, and was killed in a bloody battle on the 25th of June, A. D. 236, after a reign of about six weeks. He was of an amiable disposition, but he has been justly blamed by his biographers, on account of his lascivious propensities, which reduced him to the weakness and infirmities of old age, though he was but in his 46th year at the time of his death.——M. Antonius Pius, grandson of the first Gordian, was but 12 years old when he was honored with the title of Cæsar. He was proclaimed emperor, in the 16th year of his age, and his election was attended with universal marks of approbation. In the 18th year of his age, he married Furia Sabina Tranquillina, daughter of Misitheus, a man celebrated for his eloquence and public virtues. Misitheus was entrusted with the most important offices of the state by his son-in-law, and his administration proved how deserving he was of the confidence and affection of his imperial master. He corrected the various abuses which prevailed in the state, and restored the antient discipline among the soldiers. By his prudence and political sagacity, all the chief towns in the empire were stored with provisions, which could maintain the emperor and a large army during 15 days upon any emergency. Gordian was not less active than his father-in-law; and when Sapor, the king of Persia, had invaded the Roman provinces in the east, he boldly marched to meet him, and in his way defeated a large body of Goths, in Mœsia. He conquered Sapor, and took many flourishing cities in the east, from his adversary. In this success the senate decreed him a triumph, and saluted Misitheus as the guardian of the republic. Gordian was assassinated in the east, A. D. 244, by the means of Philip, who had succeeded to the virtuous Misitheus, and who usurped the sovereign power by murdering a warlike and amiable prince. The senate, sensible of his merit, honored him with a most splendid funeral on the confines of Persia, and ordered that the descendants of the Gordians should ever be free, at Rome, from all the heavy taxes and burdens of the state. During the reign of Gordianus, there was an uncommon eclipse of the sun, in which the stars appeared in the middle of the day.

Gordium, a town of Phrygia.

Gordius, a Phrygian, who, though originally a peasant, was raised to the throne. During a sedition the Phrygians consulted the oracle, and were told that all their troubles would cease as soon as they chose for their king, the first man they met going to the temple of Jupiter, mounted on a chariot. Gordius was the object of their choice, and he immediately consecrated his chariot in the temple of Jupiter. The knot which tied the yoke to the draught tree, was made in such an artful manner, that the ends of the cord could not be perceived. From this circumstance, a report was soon spread that the empire of Asia was promised by the oracle to him who could untie the Gordian knot. Alexander, in his conquest of Asia, passed by Gordium; and as he wished to leave nothing undone, which might inspire his soldiers with courage, and make his enemies believe that he was born to conquer Asia, he cut the knot with his sword; and from that circumstance asserted that the oracle was really fulfilled, and that his claims to universal empire were fully justified. Justin. 11, c. 7.—Curt. 3, c. 1.—Arrian. 1.——A tyrant of Corinth. Aristot.

Gorge,

Gorgo, the wife of Leonidas, king of Sparta, &c.——The name of the ſhip which carried Perſeus, after he had conquered Meduſa.

Gorgŏnes, three celebrated ſiſters, daughters of Phorcys and Ceto, whoſe names were Stheno, Euryale, and Meduſa, all immortal except Meduſa. According to the mythologiſts, their hairs were intwined with ſerpents, their hands were braſs, their body was covered with impenetrable ſcales, and their teeth were as long as the tuſks of a wild boar, and they turned to ſtones all thoſe on whom they fixed their eyes. Meduſa alone had ſerpents in her hair, according to Ovid, and this proceeded from the reſentment of Minerva, in whoſe temple Meduſa had gratified the paſſions of Neptune, who was enamoured of the beautiful color of her locks, which the goddeſs changed into ſerpents. Æſchylus ſays, that they had only one tooth and one eye between them, of which they had the uſe each in her turn; and accordingly it was at the time that they were exchanging the eye, that Perſeus attacked them, and cut off Meduſa's head. According to ſome authors, Perſeus, when he went to the conqueſt of the Gorgons, was armed with an inſtrument like a ſcythe by Mercury, and provided with a looking-glaſs by Minerva, beſides winged ſhoes, and a helmet of Pluto, which rendered all objects clearly viſible and open to the view, while the perſon who wore it remained totally inviſible. With weapons like theſe, Perſeus obtained an eaſy victory; and after his conqueſt, returned his arms to the different deities, whoſe favors and aſſiſtance he had ſo recently experienced. The head of Meduſa remained in his hands; and after he had finiſhed all his laborious expeditions he gave it to Minerva, who placed it on her ægis, with which ſhe turned into ſtones all ſuch as fixed their eyes upon it. It is ſaid, that after the conqueſt of the Gorgons, Perſeus took his flight in the air towards Æthiopia; and that the drops of blood which fell to the ground from Meduſa's head were changed into ſerpents, which have ever ſince infeſted the ſandy deſarts of Libya. The horſe Pegaſus alſo aroſe from the blood of Meduſa, as well as Chryſaor with his golden ſword. The reſidence of the Gorgons was beyond the ocean towards the weſt, according to Heſiod. Æſchylus makes them inhabit the eaſtern parts of Scythia; and Ovid, as the moſt received opinion, ſupports that they lived in the inland parts of Libya, near the lake of Triton, or the gardens of the Heſperides. Diodorus, and others, explain the fable of the Gorgons, by ſuppoſing that they were a warlike race of women near the Amazons, whom Perſeus, with the help of a large army, totally deſtroyed. *Heſiod. Gorgŏnia, a ſirname of Pallas, becauſe Perſeus, armed with her ſhield, had conquered the Gorgon, who had polluted her temple with Neptune.

Gorgŏnius, a man ridiculed by Horace for his ill ſmell. Horat. 1 Sat. 2, v. 27.

Gorgŏphŏne, a daughter of Perſeus and Andromeda, who married Perieres, king of Meſſenia, by whom ſhe had Aphareus and Leucippus. After the death of Perieres, ſhe married Œbalus, who made her mother of Icarus and Tyndarus. She is the firſt whom the mythologiſts mention as having had a ſecond huſband. Pauſ. 4, c. 2.—Apollod. 1. 2, & 3.——One of the Danaides. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

Gorgŏphŏra, a ſirname of Minerva, from her ægis, on which was the head of the gorgon Meduſa.

Gorgus, the ſon of Ariſtomenes the Meſſenian. He was married, when young, to a virgin by his father, who had experienced the greateſt kindneſſes from her humanity, and had been enabled to conquer ſeven Cretans, who had attempted his life, &c. Pauſ. 4, c. 19.——A ſon of Theron, tyrant of Agrigentum.——A man, whoſe knowledge of metals proved very ſerviceable to Alexander, &c.

Gorgythion, a ſon of Priam, killed by Teucer. Homer. Il. 8.

Gortuæ, a people of Eubœa, who fought with the Medes at the battle of Arbela. Curt. 4, c. 12.

Gortyn, Gortys, & Gortȳna, an inland town of Crete. It was on the inhabitants of this place, that Annibal, to ſave his money, practiſed an artifice recorded in C. Nep. in Ann. 9.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Lucan. 6, v. 214.

Gortȳnia, a town of Arcadia in Peloponneſus. Pauſ. 8, c. 28.

Gothi, a celebrated nation of Germany, called alſo Gothones, Gutones, Gythones and Guttones. They were warriors by profeſſion, as well as all their ſavage neighbours. They extended their power over all parts of the world, and chiefly directed their arms againſt the Roman empire. Their firſt attempt againſt Rome, was on the provinces of Greece, whence they were driven by Conſtantine. They plundered Rome, under Alaric, one of their moſt celebrated kings, A. D. 410. From becoming the enemies of the Romans, the Goths gradually became their mercenaries; and as they were powerful and united they ſoon dictated to their imperial maſters, masters, and introduced disorders, anarchy, and revolutions in the west of Europe. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 2, &c.

GRACCHUS, T. Sempronius, father of Tiberius and Caius Gracchus, was twice consul, and once censor. He made war in Gaul, and met with much success in Spain. He married Sempronia, of the family of the Scipio's, a woman of great virtue, piety, and learning. Their children, Tiberius and Caius, who had been educated under the watchful eye of their mother, rendered themselves famous for their eloquence, seditions, and an obstinate attachment to the interests of the populace, which at last proved fatal to them. With a winning eloquence, affected moderation, and uncommon popularity, Tiberius began to renew the Agrarian law, which had already caused such dissensions at Rome. (Vid. Agraria.) By the means of violence, his proposition passed into a law, and he was appointed commissioner, with his father-in-law Appius Claudius, and his brother Caius, to make an equal division of the lands among the people. The riches of Attalus, which were left to the Roman people by will, were distributed without opposition; and Tiberius enjoyed the triumph of his successful enterprize, when he was assassinated in the midst of his adherents by P. Nasica, while the populace were all unanimous to re elect him to serve the office of tribune the following year. The death of Tiberius checked, for a while, the friends of the people; but Caius, spurred by ambition and furious zeal, attempted to remove every obstacle which stood in his way by force and violence. He supported the cause of the people with more vehemence, but less moderation, than Tiberius; and his success served only to awaken his ambition, and animate his resentment against the nobles. With the privileges of a tribune, he soon became the arbiter of the republic, and treated the patricians with contempt. This behaviour hastened the ruin of Caius, and in the tumult he fled to the temple of Diana, where his friends prevented him from committing suicide. This encreased the sedition, and he was murdered by order of the consul Opimius, B. C. 121, about 13 years after the unfortunate end of Tiberius. His body was thrown into the Tiber, and his wife was forbidden to put on mourning for his death. Caius has been accused of having stained his hands in the blood of Scipio Africanus, the younger, who was found murdered in his bed.—Plut. in vitâ.—Cic. in Cat. 2.—Lucan. 6, v. 796.—Flor. 2, c. 17. l. 3, c. 14, &c.——Sempronius, a Roman, banished to the coast of Africa for his adulteries with Julia, the daughter of Augustus. He was assassinated by order of Tiberius, after he had been banished 14 years. Julia also shared his fate. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 53.——A general of the Sabines, taken by Q. Cincinnatus.——A Roman consul, defeated by Annibal, &c. C. Nep. in Ann.

GRADIVUS, a surname of Mars among the Romans, perhaps from κραδαινειν, brandishing a spear. His residence was supposed to be among the fierce and savage Thracians and Getæ, over whom he particularly presided. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 35.—Homer. Il.—Liv. 1, c. 20.

GRÆCI, the inhabitants of Greece, Vid. Græcia.

GRÆCIA, a celebrated country of Europe, bounded on the west by the Ionian sea, south by the Mediterranean sea, east by the Ægean, and north by Thrace and Dalmatia. It is generally divided into four large provinces: Macedonia, Epirus, Achaia or Hellas, and Peloponnesus. This country has been reckoned superior to every other part of the earth, on account of the salubrity of the air, the temperature of the climate, the fertility of the soil; and above all, the fame, learning, and arts of its inhabitants. The Greeks have severally been called Achæans, Argians, Danai, Dolopes, Hellenians, Ionians, Myrmidons, and Pelasgians. The most celebrated of their cities were Athens, Sparta, Argos, Corinth, Thebes, Sicyon, Mycenæ, Delphi, &c. The inhabitants, whose history is darkened in its primitive ages with fabulous accounts and traditions, supported that they were the original inhabitants of the country, and born from the earth where they dwelt; and they heard with contempt the probable conjectures, which traced their origin among the first inhabitants of Asia, and the colonies of Egypt. In the first ages, the Greeks were governed by monarchs; and there were as many kings, as there were cities. The monarchical power gradually decreased; the love of liberty established the republican government; and no part of Greece, except Macedonia, remained in the hands of an absolute sovereign. The expedition of the Argonauts first rendered the Greeks respectable among their neighbours; and in the succeeding age, the wars of Thebes and of Troy, gave opportunity to their heroes and demi-gods to display their valor in the field of battle. The simplicity of the antient Greeks, rendered them virtuous; and the establishment of the Olympic games, in particular, where the noble reward of the conqueror was a laurel crown, contributed to their aggrandizement, and made them ambitious of fame and not the slaves of riches. The austerity of their laws, and the education of their youth, particularly at Lacedæmon, rendered them brave and active, insensible to bodily pain, fearless and intrepid in the time of danger. The celebrated battles of Marathon, Thermopylæ, Salamis, Salamis, Platæa, and Mycale, ſufficiently ſhow what ſuperiority the courage of a little army can obtain over millions of undiſciplined barbarians. After many ſignal victories over the Perſians, they became elated with their ſucceſs; and when they found no one able to diſpute with them abroad, they turned their arms one againſt the other, and leagued with foreign ſtates to deſtroy the moſt flouriſhing of their cities. The Meſſenian and Peloponneſian wars, are examples of the dreadful calamities which ariſe from civil diſcord, and long proſperity. The bold retreat of the ten thouſand, who had aſſiſted Cyrus againſt his brother Artaxerxes, reminded the Greeks of their ſuperiority over all other nations; and taught Alexander, that the conqueſt of the eaſt might be made with a handful of Grecian ſoldiers. While the Greeks rendered themſelves ſo illuſtrious by their military exploits, the arts and ſciences were aſſiſted by conqueſt, and received freſh luſtre from the application and induſtry of its profeſſors. The labors of the learned were received with admiration, and the merit of a compoſition was determined by the applauſe or diſapprobation of a multitude. Their generals were orators; and eloquence ſeemed to be ſo nearly connected with the military profeſſion, that he was deſpiſed by his ſoldiers, who could not addreſs them upon any emergency with a ſpirited and well delivered oration. The learning, as well as the virtues of Socrates, procured him a name; and the writings of Ariſtotle, have, perhaps, gained him a more laſting fame, than all the conqueſts and trophies of his royal pupil. Such were the occupations and accompliſhments of the Greeks; their language became almoſt univerſal, and their country was the receptacle of the youths of the neighbouring ſtates, where they imbibed the principles of liberty and moral virtue. The Greeks planted many colonies, and totally peopled the weſtern coaſts of Aſia Minor. In the eaſtern parts of Italy, there were alſo many ſettlements made; and the country received from its Greek inhabitants, the name of Magna Græcia.

GRÆCIA MAGNA, a part of Italy, where the Greeks planted colonies, whence the name. Its boundaries are very uncertain; ſome ſay that it extended on the ſouthern parts of Italy, and others ſuppoſe that Magna Græcia comprehended only Campania and Lucania. To theſe ſome add Sicily, which was likewiſe peopled by Greek colonies. Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 64.—Strab. &c.

GRÆCINUS, a ſenator, put to death by Caligula, becauſe he refuſed to accuſe Sejanus, &c. Senec. de Benef. 2.

GRÆCUS, a man from whom ſome ſuppoſe that Greece received its name. Ariſtot.

GRAIUS, a inhabitant of Greece.

GRANICUS, a river of Bithynia, famous for a battle fought there between the armies of Alexander and Darius, 22d of May, B. C. 334, when 600,000 Perſians were defeated by 30,000 Macedonians. Diod. 17.—Plut. in Alex.—Juſtin.

GRANIUS PETRONIUS, an officer, who being taken by Pompey's generals, refuſed the life which was tendered to him; obſerving that Cæſar's ſoldiers received not, but granted life. He killed himſelf. Flut. in Cæſ.

GRANIUS, a queſtor, whom Sylla had ordered to be ſtrangled, only one day before he died a natural death. Plut.——A ſon of the wife of Marius, by a former huſband.

GRATIÆ, three goddeſſes. Vid. Charites.

GRATIANUS, a native of Pannonia, father to the emperor Valentinian 1ſt. He was raiſed to the throne, though only eight years old; and after he had reigned for ſome time conjointly with his father, he became ſole emperor, in the 16th year of his age. He ſoon after took, as his imperial colleague, Theodoſius, whom he appointed over the eaſtern parts of the empire. His courage in the field, is as remarkable as his love of learning, and fondneſs of philoſophy. He ſlaughtered 30,000 Germans in a battle, and ſupported the tottering ſtate, by his prudence and intrepidity. His enmity to the Pagan ſuperſtition of his ſubjects, proved his ruin; and Maximinus, who undertook the defence of the worſhip of Jupiter and of all the gods, was joined by an infinite number of diſcontented Romans, and met Gratian near Paris in Gaul. Gratian was forſaken by his troops in the field of battle, and was murdered by the rebels, A. D. 383, in the 24th year of his age.——A Roman ſoldier, inveſted with the imperial purple by the rebellious army in Britain, in oppoſition to Honorius. He was aſſaſſinated four months after, by thoſe very troops to whom he owed his elevation, A. D. 407.

GRATIDIA, a woman at Neapolis, called Canidia by Horace. Epod. 3.

GRATION, a giant killed by Diana.

GRATIUS FALISCUS, a Latin poet, contemporary with Ovid. He wrote a poem on courſing, called Cynegeticon, much commended for its elegance and perſpicuity. It may be compared to the Georgics of Virgil, to which it is nearly equal in the number of verſes. The lateſt edition is of Amſt. 4to. 1728.

GRAVII, a people of Spain. Ital. 3, v. 366.

GRAVISCÆ, a maritime town of Etruria, which aſſiſted Æneas againſt Turnus. The air was unwholeſome, on account of the marſhes and ſtagnant waters in its neighbourhood. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 184.

Gravius, a Roman knight of Puteoli, killed at Dyrrachium, &c. Cæs. Bell. Civ.

Gregorius, Theod. Thaumaturgus, a disciple of Origen, afterwards bishop of Neocæsarea, the place of his birth. He died A. D. 266, and it is said he left only seventeen idolaters in his diocese, where he had found only seventeen Christians. Of his works, are extant his gratulatory oration to Origen, a canonical epistle, and other treatises in greek, the best edition of which is that of Paris, fol. 1622.——Nazianzen, firnamed the Divine, was bishop of Constantinople, which he resigned on its being disputed. His writings rival those of the celebrated orators of Greece, in eloquence, sublimity, and variety. His sermons are more for philosophers, than common hearers, but replete with seriousness and devotion. Erasmus said, that he was afraid to translate his works, from the apprehension of not transfusing into another language the smartness and acumen of his stile, and the statelines and happy diction of the whole. He died, A. D. 389. The best edition is that of the Benedictins, the first volume of which, in fol. was published at Paris, 1778.——A bishop of Nyssa, author of the Nicene creed. His stile is represented as allegorical and affected; and he has been accused of mixing philosophy too much with theology. His writings consist of commentaries on scripture, moral discourses, sermons on mysteries, dogmatical treatises, panegyrics on saints; the best edition of which is that of Morell, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1615. The bishop died, A. D. 396.——Another Christian writer, whose works were edited by the Benedictins, in 4 vols. fol. Paris. 1705.

Grinnes, a people among the Batavians. Tacit. Hist. 5, c. 20.

Grophus, a man distinguished as much for his probity as his riches, to whom Horace addressed 2 Od. 16.

Gryllus, a son of Xenophon, who killed Epaminondas, and was himself slain, at the battle of Mantinea, B. C. 363. His father was offering a sacrifice when he received the news of his death, and he threw down the garland which was on his head; but he replaced it, when he heard that the enemy's general had fallen by his hands; and he observed, that his death ought to be celebrated with every demonstration of joy, rather than of lamentation. Aristot. Paus. 8, c. 11, &c.——One of the companions of Ulysses, changed into a swine by Circe.

Grynium & Grynium, a town near Cissomenæ, where Apollo had a temple with an oracle, on account of which he is called Grynæus. Strab. 13.—Virg. Ecl. 6, v. 72. Æn. 4, v. 345.

Grynæus, one of the Centaurs, who fought against the Lapithæ, &c. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 260.

Gyaros & Gyarus, an island in the Ægean sea, near Delos. The Romans were wont to send their culprits there. Ovid. 7, —Met. v. 407.

Gyas, one of the companions of Æneas, who distinguished himself at the games exhibited after the death of Anchises in Sicily. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 118, &c.——A part of the territories of Syracuse, in the possession of Dionysius——A Rutulian, son of Melampus, killed by Æneas in Italy. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 318.

Gygæus, a lake of Lydia, 40 stadia from Sardis. Propert. 3, el. 11, v. 18.

Gyge, a maid of Parysatis.

Gyges or Gyes, a son of Cœlus and Terra, represented as having a hundred hands. He, with his brothers, made war against the gods, and was afterwards punished in Tartarus. Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 7, v. 18. ——A Lydian, to whom Candaules, king of the country, showed his wife naked. The queen was so incensed at this instance of imprudence and infirmity in her husband, that she ordered Gyges, either to prepare for death himself, or to murder Candaules, A. D. 590. He chose the latter, and married the queen, and ascended the vacant throne, about 718 years before the Christian era. He was the first of the Mermnadæ, who reigned in Lydia. He reigned 38 years, and distinguished himself by the immense presents which he made to the oracle of Delphi. Herodot. 1, c. 8. According to Plato, Gyges descended into a chasm of the earth, where he found a brazen horse, whose sides he opened, and saw within the body the carcase of a man of uncommon size, from whose finger he took a brazen ring. This ring, when put on his finger, rendered him invisible; and by means of its virtue, he introduced himself to the queen, murdered her husband and married her, and usurped the crown of Lydia. Cic. off. 3, 9.——A man killed by Turnus, in his wars with Æneas. Æn. 9, v. 762.——A beautiful boy of Cnidus, in the age of Horace. Hor. 2, Od. 5, v. 30.

Gylippus a Lacedæmonian, sent B. C. 414, by his countrymen to assist Syracuse, against the Athenians. He obtained a celebrated victory over Nicias and Demosthenes, the enemy's generals, and obliged them to surrender. He accompanied Lysander, in his expedition against Athens, and was present at the taking of that celebrated town. After the fall of Athens, he was intrusted by the conqueror with the money, which had been taken in the plunder, which amounted to 1500 talents. As he conveyed it to Sparta, he had the meanness to unsew the bottom of the the bags which contained it, and ſecreted about three hundred talents. His theft was diſcovered; and to avoid the puniſhment which he deſerved, he fled from his country, and by this act of meanneſs tarniſhed the glory of his victorious actions. Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 199. Plut. in Nicia.——An Arcadian in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 272.

GYMNĂSIA, a large city near Colchis Diod. 14.

GYMNĂSIUM, a place among the Greeks, where all the public exerciſes were performed, and where not only wreſtlers and dancers exhibited, but alſo philoſophers, poets, and rhetoricians repeated their compoſitions. The room was high and ſpacious, and could contain many thouſands of ſpectators. The laborious exerciſes of the Gymnaſium were running, leaping, throwing the quoit, wreſtling and boxing, which was called by the Greeks πενταθλον, and by the Romans quinquertio. In riding, the athlete led a horſe, on which he ſometimes was mounted, conducting another by the bridle, and jumping from the one upon the other. Whoever came firſt to the goal, and jumped with the greateſt agility obtained the prize. In running a-foot the athletes were ſometimes armed, and he who came firſt was declared victorious. Leaping was an uſeful exerciſe: its primary object was to teach the ſoldiers to jump over ditches, and paſs over eminences during a ſiege, or in the field of battle. In throwing the quoit, the prize was adjudged to him who threw it fartheſt. The quoits were made either with wood, ſtone or metal. The wreſtlers employed all their dexterity to bring their adverſary to the ground, and the boxers had their hands armed with gauntlets, called alſo ceſtus. Their blows were dangerous, and often ended in the death of one of the combatants. In wreſtling and boxing, the athletes were often naked, whence the word Gymnaſium, γυμνος, nudus. They anointed themſelves with oil to brace their limbs, and to render their bodies ſlippery, and more difficult to be graſped.

GYMNĒSIÆ, two iſlands near the Iberus in the Mediterranean, called Baleares by the Greeks. Plin. 5, c. 8.—Strab. 2.

GYMNĒTÆ, a people of Æthiopia, who live almoſt naked. Plin. 5, c. 8.

GYMNOSOPHISTÆ, a certain ſect of philoſophers in India, who, according to ſome, placed their ſummum bonum in pleaſure, and their ſummum malum in pain. They lived naked as their name implies, and for 37 years they expoſed themſelves in the open air to the heat of the ſun, the inclemency of the ſeaſons, and the coldneſs of the night. They were often ſeen in the fields fixing their eyes full upon the diſc of the ſun from the time of its riſing till the hour of its ſetting. Sometimes they ſtood whole days upon one foot in burning ſand without moving, or ſhewing any concern for what ſurrounded them. Alexander was aſtoniſhed at the ſight of a ſect of men who ſeemed to deſpiſe bodily pain, and who inured themſelves to ſuffer the greateſt tortures without uttering a groan, or expreſſing any marks of fear. The conqueror condeſcended to viſit them, and his aſtoniſhment was encreaſed when he ſaw one of them aſcend a burning pile with firmneſs and unconcern, to avoid the infirmities of old age, and ſtand upright on one leg and unmoved, while the flames ſurrounded him on every ſide. Vid. Calanus. The Brachmans were a branch of the ſect of the Gymnoſophiſtæ. Vid. Brachmanes. Strab. 15, &c.—Plin. 6.—Cic. Tuſc. 5.—Lucan. 3.—Dion.

GYNÆCEAS, a woman ſaid to have been the wife of Faunus, and the mother of Bacchus and of Midas.

GYNÆCOTHŒNAS, a name of Mars at Tegea, on account of a ſacrifice offered by the women without the aſſiſtance of the men, who were not permitted to appear at this religious ceremony. Pauſ. 8, c. 48.

GYNDES, a river of Aſſyria, falling into the Tigris. When Cyrus marched againſt Babylon, his army was ſtopped by this river in which one of his favorite horſes was drowned. This ſo irritated the monarch that he ordered the river to be conveyed into 360 different channels by his army, ſo that after this diviſion it hardly reached the knee. Herodot. 1, c. 189. & 202.

GYTHĒUM, a town of Laconia in Peloponneſus, built by Hercules and Apollo, who had there deſiſted from their quarrels. The inhabitants were called Gythea-æ. Cic. Off. 3. c. 11.

HALYS, a river of Aſia minor, riſing in Cappadocia, and falling into the Euxine ſea. It received its name απο του ἁλος; from ſalt, becauſe its waters are of a ſalt and bitter taſte from the nature of the ſoil over which they flow. It is famous for the defeat of Cræſus, king of Lydia, who was miſtaken by the ambiguous word of this oracle;

Χροισος ἁλυν διαβας μεγαλην αρχην διαλυσει.

If Cræſus paſſes over the Halys, he ſhall deſtroy a great empire.

That

That empire was his own. Cic. de Div.—Lucan. 3, v. 272.—Herodot. 1, c. 28.

HALYZIA, a town of Epirus near the Achelous, where the Athenians obtained a naval victory over the Lacedæmonians.

HAMADRYĂDES, nymphs who lived in the country, and presided over trees with which they had lived and died. The word is derived from ὁμοῦ simul, and δρυς quercus. Virg. Ecl. 10.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 647.

HARMATRIS, a town of Æolia.

HĂMILLUS, an infamous debauchee. Juv. 10, v. 224

HARMŎDIUS, a friend of Aristogiton, who delivered his country from the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ. B. C. 510. [Vid. Aristogiton] The Athenians, to reward the patriotism of these illustrious citizens, made a law that no one should ever bear the name of Aristogiton and Harmodius. Herodot. 5, v. 55.

HARMŎNIA, a daughter of Mars and Venus, who married Cadmus. It is said, that Vulcan, to avenge the infidelity of her mother, made her a present of a vestment dyed in all sorts of crimes which, in some measure, inspired all the children of Cadmus with wickedness and impiety. Paus. 9, c. 16, &c.

HARMŎNIDES, a Trojan beloved by Minerva, He built the ships in which Paris carried away Helen. Homer. Il. 5.

HARPĂGUS, a general of Cyrus. He conquered Asia Minor after he had revolted from Astyages, who had cruelly forced him to eat the flesh of his son, because he had disobeyed his orders in not killing the infant Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 108.——A river near Colchis, Died. 14.

HARPĂLICE. Vid. Harpalyce.

HARPĂLION, a Trojan killed by Merion. Homer. Il. 13.

HARPĂLUS, a man entrusted with the treasures of Babylon by Alexander. His hopes that Alexander would perish in his expedition, rendered him dissipate, negligent, and vicious. When he heard, that the conqueror was returning with great resentment he fled to Athens, where, with his money, he corrupted the orators, among whom was Demosthenes, when brought to justice. He escaped with impunity to Crete, where he was at last assassinated by Thimbro. B. C. 323. Plut. in Phoc.—Died. 17.——A robber who scorned the gods. Cic. 3. de Nat. D.——A celebrated astronomer of Greece, 480 years B. C.

HARPĂLYCE, the daughter of Harpalycus, king of Thrace. Her mother died when she was but a child, and her father fed her with the milk of cows and mares, and inured her early to sustain the fatigues of hunting. When her father's kingdom was invaded by Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles, she repelled and defeated the enemy with manly courage. The death of her father, which happened soon after in a sedition, rendered her disconsolate, she fled the society of mankind, and lived in the forests upon plunder and rapine. Every attempt to secure her proved fruitless, till her great swiftness was overcome by intercepting her with a net. After her death the people of the country disputed their respective right to the possessions she had acquired by rapines, and they soon after appeased her manes by proper oblations on her tomb. Virg. Æn. 1. v. 321.—Hygin. fab. 193 & 252.——A beautiful virgin, daughter of Clymenus and Epicaste of Argos. Her father became enamoured of her, and gained her confidence, and enjoyed her company by means of her nurse, who introduced him as a stranger. Some time after she married Alastor, but the father's passion became more violent and incontroulable in his daughter's absence, and he murdered her husband to bring her back to Argos. Harpalyce, inconsolable for the death of her husband, and ashamed of her father's passion, which was then made public, resolved to revenge her wrongs. She killed her younger brother, or, according to some, the fruit of her incest, and served it before her father. She begged the gods to remove her from the world, and she was changed into an owl, and Clymenus killed himself. Hygin. fab. 253, &c.—Parthen. in Erot.——A mistress of Iphiclus, son of Thestius. She died through despair on seeing herself despised by her lover. This mournful story was composed in poetry, in the form of a dialogue called Harpalyce, Athen. 14.

HARPĂLYCUS, one of the companions of Æneas, killed by Camilla. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 675.——The father of Harpalyce, king of the Amymneans, in Thrace.

HARPĂSA, a town of Caria.

HARPĂSUS, a river of Caria. Liv. 38, c. 13.

HARPŎCRĂTES, a divinity supposed to be the same as Oris the son of Isis, among the Egyptians. He is represented as holding one of his fingers on his mouth, and from thence he is called the god of ſilence, and intimates, that the myſteries of religion and philoſophy ought never to be revealed to the people. The Romans placed his ſtatues at the entrance of their temples.

HARPYIÆ, winged monſters, who had the face of a woman, the body of a vulture, and had their feet and fingers armed with ſharp claws. They were three in number, Aello, Ocypete, and Celeno, daughters of Neptune and Terra. They were ſent by Juno to plunder the tables of Phineus, whence they were driven to the iſlands called Strophades by Zethes and Calais. They emitted an infectious ſmell, and ſpoiled whatever they touched by their filth and excrements. They plundered Æneas during his voyage towards Italy, and predicted many of the calamities which attended him. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 212, l. 6, v. 289.—Heſiod. Theog. 265.

HARUSPEX, a ſoothſayer at Rome, who drew omens by conſulting the entrails of beaſts that were ſacrificed. He received the name of Aruſpex, ab aris aſpiciendis, and that of Extiſpex, ab extis inſpiciendis. The order of Aruſpices was firſt eſtabliſhed at Rome by Romulus, and the firſt Aruſpices were Tuſcans by origin, as they were particularly famous in that branch of divination. They had received all their knowledge from a boy named Tages, who, as was commonly reported, ſprung from a clod of earth. [Vid. Tages] They were originally three, but the Roman ſenate yearly ſent ſix noble youths, or, according to others, twelve to Etruria, to be inſtructed in all the myſteries of the art. The office of the Haruſpices conſiſted in obſerving theſe four particulars; the beaſt before it was ſacrificed; its entrails; the flames which conſumed the ſacrifice; and the flour, frankincenſe, &c. which was uſed. If the beaſt was led up to the altar with difficulty, if it eſcaped from the conductor's hands, roared when it received the blow, or died in agonies, the omen was unfortunate. But, on the contrary, if it followed without compulſion, received the blow without reſiſtance, and died without groaning, and, after much effuſion of blood, the haruſpex foretold proſperity. When the body of the victim was opened, each part was ſcrupulouſly examined, if any thing was wanting, if it had a double liver, or a lean heart, the omen was unfortunate. If the entrails fell from the hands of the haruſpex, or ſeemed beſmeared with too much blood, or if no heart appeared, as for inſtance it happened in the two victims which J. Cæſar offered a little before his death, the omen was equally unlucky. When the flame was quickly kindled, and when it violently conſumed the ſacrifice, and aroſe pure and bright, and like a pyramid, without any paleneſs, ſmoke, ſparkling, or crackling, the omen was favorable. But the contrary argury was drawn, when the fire was kindled with difficulty, and was extinguiſhed before the ſacrifice was totally conſumed, or when it rolled in circles round the victim with intermdiate ſpaces between the flames. In regard to the frankincenſe, meal, water, and wine, if there was any deficiency in the quantity, if the color was different, or the quality was changed, or if any thing was done with irregularity, it was deemed inauſpicious. This cuſtom of conſulting the entrails of victims did not originate in Tuſcany, but it was in uſe among the Chaldæans, Greeks, Egyptians, &c. and the more enlightened part of mankind well knew how to render it ſubſervient to their wiſhes or tyranny. Ageſilaus, when in Egypt, raiſed the drooping ſpirit of his ſoldiers by a ſuperſtitious artifice. He ſecretly wrote on his hand the word νικη victory, in large characters, and holding the entrails of a victim in his hand till the impreſſion was communicated to the fleſh, he ſhewed it to his ſoldiers, and animated them by obſerving, that the gods ſignified their approaching victories even by making it in the body of the ſacrificed animals.

HEBE, a daughter of Jupiter and Juno. According to ſome ſhe was the daughter of Juno only, who conceived her after eating lettuces. As ſhe was fair, and always in the bloom of youth, ſhe was called the goddeſs of youth, and made by her mother cup-bearer to all the gods. She was diſmiſſed from her office by Jupiter, becauſe ſhe fell down in an indecent poſture as ſhe was pouring nectar to the gods at a grand feſtival, and Ganymedes, the favorite of Jupiter, ſucceeded her as cup-bearer. She was employed by her mother to prepare her chariot, and to harneſs her peacocks whenever requiſite. When Hercules was raiſed to the rank of a god, he was reconciled to Juno by marrying her daughter Hebe, by whom he had two ſons, Alexiares and Anicetus. As Hebe had the power of reſtoring gods and men to the vigor of youth, ſhe, at the inſtance of her huſband, performed that kind office to Jolas his friend. Hebe was worſhipped at Sicyon, under the name of Dia, and at Rome under the name of Juventas. She is repreſented as a young virgin crowned with flowers, and arrayed in a variegated garment. Pauſ. 1, c. 19. l. 2, HECĂLE, a poor old woman who kindly received Theseus as he was going against the bull of Marathon, &c. Plut. in Thes.—A town of Attica.

HECALĒSIA, a festival in honor of Jupiter of Hecale, instituted by Theseus, or in commemoration of the kindness of Hecale, which Theseus had experienced when he went against the bull of Marathon, &c.

HECAMĒDE, a daughter of Arsinous, who fell to the lot of Nestor after the plunder of Tenedos by the Greeks. Homer. Il. 11.

HECATÆUS, an historian of Miletus, born 549 years before Christ, in the reign of Darius Hystaspes. Herodot. 2, c. 143.—A Macedonian, intimate with Alexander. Diod. 17.—A Macedonian brought to the army against his will by Amyntas, &c. Curt. 7, c. 1.

HECĂTE, a daughter of Perses and Asteria, the same as Proserpine, or Diana. She was called Luna in heaven, Diana on earth, and Hecate or Proserpine in hell, whence her name of Diva triformis, tergemina, triceps. She was supposed to preside over magic and enchantments, and was generally represented like a woman, with the head of a horse, a dog or a boar, and sometimes she appeared with three different bodies, and three different faces only with one neck. Dogs, lambs, and honey were generally offered to her, especially in ways and cross roads, whence she obtained the name of Trivia. Her power was extended over heaven, the earth, sea, and hell, and to her kings and nations supposed themselves indebted for their prosperity. Ovid 7, Met. v. 94.—Hesiod. Theog.—Horat. 3, od. 22.—Paus. 2, c. 32.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 511.

HECATĒSIA, a yearly festival observed by the Stratonicensians in honor of Hecate. The Athenians paid also particular worship to this goddess, who was deemed the patroness of families and of children. From this circumstance the statues of the goddess were erected before the doors of the houses, and upon every new moon a public supper was always provided at the expence of the richest people, and set in the streets where the poorest of the citizens were permitted to retire and feast upon it, while they reported that Hecate had devoured it. There were also expiatory offerings to supplicate the goddess to remove whatever evils might impend on the head of the public, &c.

HECATOMBOIA, a festival celebrated in honor of Juno by the Argians and people of Ægina. It receives its name from ἑκατὸν, & Βοῦς, a sacrifice of a hundred bulls, which were always offered to the goddess, and the flesh distributed among the poorest citizens. There were also public games first instituted by Archinus, a king of Argos, in which the prize was a shield of brass with a crown of myrtle.

HECATOMPHŎNIA, a solemn sacrifice offered by the Messenians to Jupiter when any of them had killed an hundred enemies.

HECATOMPŎLIS, an epithet given to Crete, from the hundred cities which it once contained.

HECATOMPȳLOS, an epithet applied to Thebes, in Egypt, on account of its hundred gates.

HECTOR, a son of king Priam and Hecuba, was the most valiant of all the Trojan chiefs, that fought against the Greeks. He married Andromache the daughter of Eetion, by whom he had Astyanax. He was appointed captain of all the Trojan forces, when Troy was besieged by the Greeks; and the valor with which he behaved showed how well qualified he was to discharge that important office. He engaged with the bravest of the Greeks, and according to Hyginus, no less than 31 of the most valiant of the enemy perished by his hand. When Achilles had driven back the Trojans toward the city, Hector, too great to fly, waited the approach of his enemy near the Scean gates, though his father and mother with tears in their eyes, blamed his rashness and entreated him to retire. The sight of Achilles terrified him, and he fled before him in the plain. The Greek pursued and Hector was killed, and his body was dragged in cruel triumph by the conqueror round the tomb of Patroclus whom Hector had killed. The body, after it had received the grossest insult, was ransomed by old Priam, and the Trojans obtained from the Greeks a truce of some days to pay the last offices to the greatest of their leaders. The Thebans boasted in the age of the geographer Pausanias that they had the ashes of Hector preserved in an urn, by order of an oracle; which promised them undisturbed felicity if they were in possession of that hero's remains. The epithet of Hectoreus is applied by the poets to the Trojans, as beſt expreſſive of valor and intrepidity. Homer. Il. 1. &c.---Virg Æn. 1, &c ---Ovid. Met. 12 & 13.—Dictys. Cret.—Dares. Phryg.—Hygin. Fab. 90 & 112.—Pauſ. l. 3, & 9, c. 18.—Quintil. Smyrn. 1 & 3.—— A ſon of Parmenio drowned in the Nile. Curt. 4, c. 8, l. 6, c. 9.

HECŬBA, daughter of Dymas Phrygian prince, or according to others, of Ciſſeis, a Thracian king, was the ſecond wife of Priam king of Troy, and proved the chaſteſt of women, and the moſt tender and unfortunate of mothers. When ſhe was pregnant of Paris, ſhe dreamed that ſhe had brought into the world a burning torch which had reduced her huſband's palace and all Troy to aſhes. So alarming a dream was explained by the ſoothſayers, who declared that the ſon ſhe ſhould bring into the world would prove the ruin of his country. When Paris was born ſhe expoſed him on mount Ida to avert the calamities which threatened her family, but her attempts to deſtroy him were fruitleſs, and the prediction of the ſoothſayers was fulfilled. [Vid. Paris.] During the Trojan war ſhe ſaw the greateſt part of her children periſh by the hands of the enemy, and like a mother ſhe confeſſed her grief by her tears and lamentations, particularly at the death of Hector her eldeſt ſon. When Troy was taken, Hecuba, as one of the captives fell to the lot of Ulyſſes, a man whom ſhe hated for his perfidy and avarice, and ſhe embarked with the conquerors for Greece. The Greeks landed in the Thracian Cherſoneſus to load with freſh honors the grave of Achilles. During their ſtay the hero's ghoſt appeared to them, and demanded, to enſure the ſafety of their return, the ſacrifice of Polyxena, Hecuba's daughter. They complied, and Polyxena was torn from her mother to be ſacrificed. Hecuba was inconſolable, and her grief was ſtill more encreaſed at the ſight of the body of her ſon Polydorus waſhed on the ſhore, who had been recommended by his father to the care and humanity of Polymneſtor king of the country. [Vid. Polydorus.] She determined to revenge the death of her ſon, and with the greateſt indignation went to the houſe of his murderer and tore his eyes and attempted to deprive him of his life. She was hindered from executing her bloody purpoſe, by the arrival of ſome Thracians, and ſhe fled with the female companions of her captivity. She was purſued, and when ſhe ran after the ſtones that were thrown at her ſhe found herſelf ſuddenly changed into a bitch, and when ſhe attempted to ſpeak, found that ſhe could only bark. After this metamorphoſis ſhe threw herſelf into the ſea, according to Hyginus, and that place was, from that circumſtance, called Cynos. Hecuba had a great number of children by Priam, among whom were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Pammon, Helenus, Polites, Antiphon, Hipponous, Polydorus, Troilus, and among the daughters, Creuſa, Ilione, Laodice, Polyxena, and Caſſandra. *Ovid. HEGETORIDES, a Thacian, who, upon seeing his country besieged by the Athenians, and a law forbidding any one on pain of death to speak of peace, went to the market place with a rope about his neck, and boldly told his countrymen to treat him as they pleased, provided they saved the city from the calamities which the continuation of the war seemed to threaten. The Thasians were awakened, the law was abrogated, and Hegetorides pardoned, &c. Polyæn. 2.

HELENA, the most beautiful woman of her age, sprung from one of the eggs which Leda, the wife of king Tyndarus, brought forth after her amour with Jupiter metamorphosed into a swan. [Vid. Leda.] According to some authors, Helen was daughter of Nemesis by Jupiter, and Leda was only her nurse, and to reconcile this variety of opinions some imagine that Nemesis and Leda are the same persons. Her beauty was so universally admired even in her infancy, that Theseus, with his friend Pirithous carried her away before she had attained her 10th year, and concealed her at Aphidnæ, under the care of his mother Æthra. Her brothers, Castor and Pollux, recovered her by force of arms, and she returned safe and unpolluted to Sparta, her native country. There existed, however, a tradition recorded by Pausanias, that Helen was of nubile years when carried away by Theseus, and that she had a daughter by her ravisher, who was entrusted to the care of Clytemnestra. This violence offered to her virtue did not in the least diminish, but rather augmented her fame, and her hand was eagerly solicited by the young princes of Greece. The most celebrated of her suitors were Ulysses, son of Laertes, Antilochus son of Nestor, Sthenelus son of Capaneus, Diomedes son of Tydeus, Amphilochus son of Cteatus, Meges son of Phileus, Agapenor son of Ancæus, Thalpius son of Eurytus, Mnestheus son of Peteus, Schedius son of Epistrophus, Polyxenus son of Agasthenes, Amphilochus son of Amphiaraus, Ascalaphus and Ialmus sons of the god Mars, Ajax son of Oileus, Eumelus son of Admetus, Polypœtes son of Pirithous, Elphenor son of Chalcodon, Podalyrus and Machaon son of Æsculapius, Leonteus son of Coronus, Philoctetes son of Pæan, Protesilaus son of Iphiclus, Eurypilus son of Evemon, Ajax and Teucer sons of Telamon, Patroclus son of Menœtius, Menelaus son of Atreus, Thoas, Idomeneus and Merion. Tyndarus was rather alarmed than pleased at the sight of such a number of illustrious princes who eagerly solicited each to become his son-in-law. He knew that he could not prefer one without displeasing all the rest, and from this perplexity he was at last drawn by the artifice of Ulysses, who began to be already known in Greece by his prudence and sagacity. This prince who clearly saw that his pretensions to Helen would not probably meet with success in opposition to so many rivals, proposed to extricate Tyndarus from all his difficulties if he would promise him his niece Penelope in marriage. Tyndarus consented, and Ulysses advised the king to bind, by a solemn oath, all the suitors that they would approve of the uninfluenced choice which Helen should make of one among them; and engage to unite together to defend her person and character if ever any attempts were made to ravish her from the arms of her husband. The advice of Ulysses was followed, the princes consented, and Helen fixed her eyes upon Menelaus and married him. Hermione was the early fruit of this union, which continued for three years with mutual happiness. After this, Paris, son of Priam king of Troy, came to Lacedæmon on pretence of sacrificing to Apollo. He was kindly received by Menelaus, but shamefully abused his favors, and in his absence in Crete he corrupted the fidelity of his wife Helen, and persuaded her to follow him to Troy B. C. 1198. At his return Menelaus, highly sensible of the injury he had received, assembled the Grecian princes, and reminded them of their solemn promises. They resolved to make war against the Trojans; but they previously sent ambassadors to Priam to demand the restitution of Helen. The influence of Paris at his father's court prevented the restoration, and the Greeks returned home without receiving the satisfaction they required. Soon after their return their combined forces assembled and sailed for the coast of Asia. The behaviour of Helen during the Trojan war is not known for certainty. Some assert that she had willingly followed Paris, and that she warmly supported the cause of the Trojans; while others believe that she always sighed after her husband, and cursed the day in which she had proved faithless to his bed. Homer represents her as in the last instance, and some have added that she often betrayed the schemes and resolutions of the Trojans, and secretly favored the cause of Greece. When Paris was killed in the ninth year of the war, she voluntarily married Deiphobus, one of Priam's sons, and when Troy was taken she made no scruple to betray him, and to introduce the Greeks into his chamber, to ingratiate herself with Menelaus. She returned to Sparta, and the loving Menelaus forgave the errors which she had committed. Some say that she obtained her life even with difficulty from her husband, whose resentment she had kindled by her infidelity. After she had lived for some years at Sparta, Menelaus died, and she was driven from Peloponnesus by Megapenthes and Nicostratus, the illegitimate sons of her husband, and she retired to Rhodes, where at that time, Polyxo, a native of Argos, reigned over the country. Polyxo remembered that her widowhood originated in Helen, and that her husband Tlepolemus had been killed in the Trojan war, which had been caused by the debaucheries of Helen, therefore she meditated revenge. While Helen one day retired to bathe in the river, Polyxo disguised her attendants in the habit of furies and sent them with orders to murder her enemy. Helen was tied to a tree and strangled, and her misfortunes were afterwards remembered, and the crimes of Polyxo expiated by the temple which the Rhodians raised to Helen Dendritis, or tied to a tree. There is a tradition mentioned by Herodotus, which says that Paris was driven as he returned from Sparta, upon the coast of Egypt, where Proteus, king of the country, expelled him from his dominions for his ingratitude to Menelaus, and confined Helen. From that circumstance, therefore, Priam informed the Grecian ambassadors that neither Helen nor her possessions were in Troy, but in the hands of the king of Egypt. In spite of this assertion the Greeks besieged the town and took it after ten years siege, and Menelaus by visiting Egypt, as he returned home, recovered Helen at the court of Proteus, and was convinced that the Trojan war had been undertaken upon very unjust and unpardonable grounds. Helen was honored after death as a goddess, and the Spartans built her a temple at Therapne, which had power of giving beauty to all the deformed women that entered it. Helen, according to some, was carried into the island of Leuce after death, where she married Achilles, who had been once one of her warmest admirers.—The age of Helen has been a matter of deep enquiry among the chronologists. If she was born of the same eggs as Castor and Pollux, who accompanied the Argonauts in their expedition against Colchis about 35 years before the Trojan war, according to some, she was no less than 60 years old when Troy was reduced to ashes, supposing that her brothers were only 15 when they embarked with the Argonauts. But she is represented by Homer so incomparably beautiful during the siege of Troy, that though seen at a distance she influenced the counsellors of Priam by the brightness of her charms; therefore we must suppose with others, that her beauty remained long undiminished, and was extinguished only at her death. Paus. 3, c. 19, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 10, &c.—Hygin. fab. 77.—*Ptolem. HĔLĔNOR, a Lydian prince who accompanied Æneas to Italy, and was killed by the Rutulians. His mother's name was Lycymnia. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 444, &c.

HĔLĔNUS, a celebrated soothsayer, son of Priam and Hecuba. He was greatly respected by all the Trojans. When Deiphobus was given in marriage to Helen in preference to himself, he resolved to leave his country, and retired to mount Ida, where Ulysses took him prisoner by the advice of Chalcas. As he was well acquainted with futurity, the Greeks made use of prayers, threats, and promises, to induce him to reveal the secrets of the Trojans, and either the fear of death or gratification of resentment seduced him to disclose to the enemies of his country, that Troy could not be taken whilst it was in possession of the Palladium, nor before Polydectes came from his retreat at Lemnos, and assisted to support the siege. After the ruin of his country, he fell to the share of Pyrrhus the son of Achilles, and saved his life by warning him to avoid a dangerous tempest which in reality proved fatal to all those who set sail. This endeared him to Pyrrhus, and he received from his hand Andromache the widow of his brother Hector, by whom he had a son called Cestrinus. This marriage according to some, was consummated after the death of Pyrrhus, who lived with Andromache as with a wife. Helenus was the only one of Priam's sons who survived the ruin of his country. After the death of Pyrrhus, he reigned over part of Epirus, which he called Chaonia in memory of his brother Chaon, whom he had inadvertently killed. Helenus received Æneas as he voyaged towards Italy, and foretold him some of the calamities which attended his fleet. The manner in which he received the gift of prophecy is doubtful. Vid.

HĔLIĂDES, the daughters of the Sun and Clymene. They were three in number, Lampetie, Phaetuſa, and Lampethuſa, or ſeven, according to Hygin, Merope, Helie, Ægle, Lampetie, Phœbe, Ætheria, and Dioxippe. They were ſo afflicted at the death of their brother Phaeton, [Vid. Phaeton] that they were changed by the gods into poplars, and their tears into precious amber, on the banks of the river Po. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 340—Hygin. fab. 154.——The firſt inhabitants of Rhodes. This iſland being covered with mud when the world was firſt created, was warmed by the cheriſhing beams of the ſun, and from thence ſprang ſeven men, which were called Heliades, ἀπὸ τοῦ ἡλίου, from the ſun. The eldeſt of theſe, called Ochimus, married Hegetoria, one of the nymphs of the iſland, and his brothers fled from the country for having put to death, through jealouſy, one of their number. Diod. 5.

HELIOGABĂLUS, a deity among the Phœnicians.——M. Aurelius Antoninus, a Roman emperor, ſon of Varius Marcellus, called Heliogabalus, becauſe he had been prieſt of that divinity in Phœnicia. After the death of Macrinus, he was inveſted with the imperial purple, and the Senate, however unwilling to ſubmit to a youth only 14 years of age, approved of his election, and beſtowed upon him the title of Auguſtus. Heliogabalus made his grand-mother Mœſa, and his mother Sœmias, his colleagues on the throne; and to beſtow more dignity upon the ſex, he choſe a ſenate of women, over which his mother preſided, and preſcribed all the modes and faſhions which prevailed in the empire. Rome now diſplayed a ſcene of cruelty and debauchery, the imperial palace was full of proſtitution, and the moſt infamous of the populace became the favorites of the prince. He raiſed his horſe to the honors of the conſulſhip, and obliged his ſubjects to pay adoration to the god, Heliogabalus, which was no other than a large black ſtone, whoſe figure reſembled that of a cone. To this ridiculous deity temples were raiſed at Rome, and the altars of the gods plundered to deck thoſe of the new divinity. In the midſt of his extravagances Heliogabalus married four wives, and not ſatisfied with following the plain laws of nature, he profeſſed himſelf to be a woman, and gave himſelf up to one of his officers, called Hierocles. In this ridiculous farce he ſuffered the greateſt indignities from his pretended huſband without diſſatisfaction, and Hierocles by ſtooping to infamy became the moſt powerful of the favorites, and enriched himſelf by ſelling favors, and offices to the people. Such licentiouſneſs ſoon diſpleaſed the populace, and Heliogabalus unable to appeaſe the ſeditions of the ſoldiers, whom his rapacity and debaucheries had irritated, hid himſelf in the filth and excrements of the camp, where he was found in the arms of his mother. His head was ſevered from his body the 10th of March, A. D. 222, in the 18th year of his age, after a reign of three years nine months and four days. He was ſucceeded by Alexander Severus. His cruelties were as conſpicuous as his licentiouſneſs. He burdened his ſubjects with the moſt oppreſſive taxes, his halls were covered with carpets of gold and ſilver tiſſue, and his mats were made with the down of hares, and with the ſoft feathers which were found under the wings of partridges. He was fond of covering his ſhoes with precious ſtones to draw the admiration of the people as he walked along the ſtreets, and he was the firſt Roman who ever wore a dreſs of ſilk. He often invited the moſt common of the people to ſhare his banquets, and made them ſit down on large bellows full of wind, which, by ſuddenly emptying themſelves, threw the gueſts on the ground, and left them a prey to wild beaſts. He often tied ſome of his favorites on a large wheel, and was particularly delighted to ſee them whirled round like Ixions, and ſometimes ſuſpended in the air, or ſunk beneath the water, Heliŏpŏlis, a famous city of Lower Egypt, in which was a temple ſacred to the ſun. The inhabitants worſhipped a bull called Mnevis, with the ſame ceremonies as the Apis of Memphis. Hellas, an antient name of Theſſaly, more generally applied to the territories of Acarnania, Attica, Ætolia, Doris, Locris, Bœotia and Phocis, and alſo to all Greece. It received this name from Deucalion, and now forms a part of Livadia. Strab. 8.—Mela 2, c. 3.—Pauſ. 2, c. 20. A beautiful woman in the page of Horace, beloved of Marius; the lover killed her in a fit of paſſion, and afterwards deſtroyed himſelf. Horat. 2, ſat. 3, v. 277.

Helle, a daughter of Athamas and Nephele, ſiſter to Phryxus. She fled from her father's houſe with her brother, to avoid the cruel oppreſſion of her mother-in-law, Ino. According to ſome accounts ſhe was carried through the air on a golden ram which her mother had received from Neptune, and in her paſſage ſhe became giddy and fell from her ſeat into that part of the ſea which from her received the name of Helleſpont. Others ſay that ſhe was carried on a cloud, or rather upon a ſhip, from which ſhe fell into the ſea and was drowned. Phryxus, after he had given his ſiſter a burial on the neighbouring coaſts, purſued his journey and arrived ſafe in Colchis. [Vid. Phryxus.] Ovid. Heroid. 13, &c.

Hellen, ſon of Deucalion and Pyrrha, reigned in Phthiotis about 1495 years before the Chriſtian era, and gave the name of Hellenians to his ſubjects. He had, by his wife Orſeis, three ſons; Æolus, Dorus, and Xuthus, who gave their names to the three different nations known under the name of Æolians, Dorians, and Ionians. Theſe laſt derive their name from Ion, ſon of Xuthus, and from the difference either of expreſſion, or pronunciation in their reſpective languages, aroſe the different dialects well known in the Greek language. Pauſ. 3, c. 20, l. 7, c. 1.—Diod. 5.

Hellenes, the inhabitants of Greece, Vid. Hellen.

Helleſpontus, a narrow ſtrait between Aſia and Europe, near the Propontis, which received its name from Helle who was drowned there in her voyage to Colchis. [Vid. Helle.] It is about 33 miles long, and, in the broadeſt parts, the Aſiatic coaſt is about one mile and a half diſtant from the European, and only half a mile in the narroweſt, according to modern inveſtigation; ſo that people can converſe one with the other from the oppoſite ſhores. It is celebrated for the love and death of Leander, [Vid. Hero.] and for the bridge of boats which Xerxes built over it when he invaded Greece. The folly of this great prince is well known in beating and fettering the waves of the ſea, whoſe impetuoſity deſtroyed his ſhips, and rendered all his labors ineffectual. This ſtrait is now called the Dardanelles. Strab. 13.—Plin. 8, c. 32.—Herodot. 7, c. 34.---Polyb.---Mela. 1, c. 1.---Ptol. 5, c. 2.---Ovid. Met. 13, v. 407.

Helloria, a ſmall country of Eubœa. The people were called Hellopes. The whole iſland bore the ſame name, according to Strabo 10. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Hellōtia, two feſtivals, one of which was obſerved in Crete, in honor of Europa, whoſe bones were then carried in ſolemn proceſſion with a myrtle garland no leſs than twenty cubits in circumference, called ἑλλωτις. The other feſtival was celebrated at Corinth with games and races, where young men entered the liſts and generally ran with burning torches in their hands. It was inſtituted in honor of Minerva, ſirnamed Elotis, απο του ἑλους, from a certain pond of Marathon, where one of her ſtatues was erected, or απο του ελειν τον ἱππον τον Πηγασον, becauſe by her aſſiſtance Bellerophon took and managed the horſe Pegaſus, which was the original cauſe of the inſtitution of the feſtival. Others derive the name from Hellotis, a Corinthian woman, from the following circumſtance: when the Dorians and the Heraclidæ invaded Peloponneſus, they took and burnt Corinth; the inhabitants, and particularly the women, eſcaped by flight, except Hellotis and her ſiſter Eurytione, who took ſhelter in Minerva's temple, relying for ſafety upon the ſanctity of the place. When this was known, the Dorians ſet fire to the temple, and the two ſiſters periſhed in the flames. This wanton cruelty was followed by a dreadful plague, and the Dorians to alleviate the misfortunes which they ſuffered, were directed by the oracle to appeaſe the manes of the two ſiſters, and therefore they raiſed a new temple to the goddeſs Minerva, and eſtabliſhed the feſtivals, which bore the name of one of the unfortunate women.

Helos, a place of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8. c. 36. —— A town of Laconia, taken and deſtroyed by the Lacedæmonians, under Agis the third, of the race of the Heraclidæ, becauſe they refuſed to pay the tribute which was impoſed upon them. The Lacedæmonians carried their reſentment ſo far, that, not ſatisfied with the ruin of the city, they reduced the inhabitants to the loweſt and moſt miſerable ſlavery, and made a law which forbade their maſters of either giving them their liberty, or ſelling them in any other country. And to complete their infamy, all the ſlaves of the ſtate and the priſoners of war, were called by the mean appellation of Helotæ. Not only the ſervile offices in which they were employed denoted their miſery and ſlavery, but they were obliged to wear peculiar garments, which expoſed them to greater contempt and ridicule. They never were inſtructed in the liberal arts, and their cruel maſters often obliged them to drink to exceſs, to ſhow the free born citizens of Sparta the beaſtlineſs and diſgrace of intoxication. They once every year received a number of ſtripes, that by this wanton flagellation they might recollect that they were born and died ſlaves. The Spartans even declared war againſt them, but Plutarch, who, from intereſted motives endeavours to palliate the guilt and cruelty of the people of Lacedæmon, declares that it was becauſe they had aſſiſted the Meſſenians in their war againſt Sparta, after it had been overthrown by a violent earthquake. This earthquake was ſuppoſed by all the Greeks, to be a puniſhment from heaven for the cruelties which the Lacedæmonians had exerciſed againſt the Helots. In the Peloponneſian war, theſe miſerable ſlaves behaved with uncommon bravery, and were rewarded with their liberty by the Lacedæmonians, and appeared in the temples, and at publie ſhows crowned with garlands, and with every mark of feſtivity and triumph. This exultation did not continue long, and the ſudden diſappearance of the two thouſand manumitted ſlaves was attributed to the inhumanity of the Lacedæmonians. Thucyd. 4.—Pollux. 3, c. 8.—Strab. 8.—Plut. in Lyc. &c.—*Ariſtot. HEPHÆSTIA, the capital town of Lemnos. —— A feſtival in honor of Vulcan Ἡφαίστος, at Athens. There was then a race with torches between three young men. Each in his turn ran a race with a lighted torch in his hand, and whoever could carry it to the end of the courſe before it was extinguiſhed, obtained the prize. They delivered it one to the other after they finiſhed their courſe, and from that circumſtance we ſee many alluſions in antient authors who compare the viciſſitudes of human affairs to this delivering of the torch, particularly in theſe lines of Lucretius 2.

Inque brevi ſpatio mutantur ſæcla animantum,
Et quaſi curſores vitai lampada tradunt.

HEPHÆSTII, mountains in Lycia, which are ſet on fire by the lighteſt touch of a burning torch. Their very ſtones burn in the middle of water according to Pliny, 6. c. 106.

HEPHÆSTION, a Macedonian famous for his intimacy with Alexander. He accompanied the conqueror in his Aſiatic conqueſts, and was ſo faithful and attached to him, that Alexander often obſerved that Craterus was the friend of the king, but Hephæſtion the friend of Alexander. He died at Ecbatana 325 years before the Chriſtian era, according to ſome from exceſs of drinking, or eating. Alexander was ſo inconſolable at the death of this faithful ſubject, that he ſhed tears at the intelligence, and ordered the ſacred fire to be extinguiſhed, which was never done but at the death of a Perſian monarch. The phyſician, who attended Hephæſtion in his illneſs, was put to death, by the king's orders, and the games were interrupted. His body was entruſted to the care of Perdiccas, and honored with the moſt magnificent funeral at Babylon. He was ſo like the king in features and ſtature, that he was often ſaluted by the name of Alexander. Curt.—Arrian. 7. &c.—Plut. in Alex.—Ælian. V. H. 7. c. 8.

HERĂCLĔA, an antient town of Sicily, near Agrigentum. Minos planted a colony there when he purſued Dædalus, and the town antiently known by the name of Macara, was called from him Minoa. It was called Heraclea after Hercules, when he obtained a victory over Eryx. —— A town of Macedonia. —— Another in Pontus, celebrated for its naval power, and its conſequence among the Aſiatic ſtates. The inhabitants conveyed home in their ſhips the 10,000 at their return.—Another in Crete. ——Another in Parthia---Another in Bithynia. ——Another in Phthiotis, near Thermopylæ. There were no leſs than 40 cities of that name in different parts of the world, all built in honor of Hercules, whence the name is derived---A daughter of Hiero, tyrant of Sicily, &c.

HERACLĔIA, a feſtival at Athens celebrated every fifth year, in honor of Hercules. The Thiſbians and Thebans in Bœotia, obſerved a feſtival of the ſame name, in which they offered apples to the god. This cuſtom of offering apples aroſe from this: It was always uſual to offer ſheep, but the overflowing of the river Aſopus prevented the votaries of the god from obſerving it with the antient ceremony; and as the word μηλον ſignifies both an apple, and a ſheep, ſome youths, acquainted with the ambiguity of the word, offered apples to the god, with much ſport and feſtivity. To repreſent the ſheep, they raiſed an apple upon four ſticks as the legs, and two more were placed at the top to repreſent the horns of the victim. Hercules was delighted with the ingenuity of the youths, and the feſtivals were ever continued with the offering of apples. Pollux. 8, c. 9. There was alſo a feſtival at Sicyon in honor of Hercules. It continued two days, the firſt was called ονομαται, the ſecond πραχλεια. —— At a feſtival of the ſame name at Cos, the prieſt officiated with a mitre on his head, and in women's apparel. —— At Lindus a ſolemnity of the ſame name was also observed, and at the celebration nothing was heard but execrations and profane words, and whosoever accidentally dropped any other words, was accused of having profaned the sacred rites, Heracleum, a promontory of Cappadocia.

Heracleōtes, a surname of Dionysius the philosopher. — A philosopher of Heraclea, who, like his master Zeno, and all the Stoics, firmly believed that pain was not an evil. A severe illness attended with the most acute pains obliged him to renounce his principles, and at the same time the philosophy of the Stoics, about 264 years before the Christian era. He became afterwards one of the Cyrenaic sect, which placed the summum bonum in pleasure. He wrote some poetry, and chiefly treatises of pholosophy. Diog. in vit.

Heraclīdæ, the descendants of Hercules, greatly celebrated in antient history. Hercules at his death left to his son Hyllus all the rights and claims which he had upon the Peloponnesus, and permitted him to marry Iole, as soon as he came of age. The posterity of Hercules were not more kindly treated by Eurystheus, than their father had been, and they were obliged to retire for protection to the court of Ceyx, king of Trachinia. Eurystheus pursued them thither; and Ceyx afraid of his resentment, begged the Heraclidæ to depart from his dominions. From Trachinia they came to Athens, where Theseus, the king of the country, who had accompanied their father in some of his expeditions, received them with great humanity, and assisted them against their common enemy, Eurystheus. Eurystheus was killed by the hand of Hyllus himself, and his children perished with him, and all the cities of the Peloponnesus became the undisputed property of the Heraclidæ. Their triumph, however, was short, their numbers were lessened by a pestilence, and the oracle informed them that they had taken possession of the Peloponnesus before the gods permitted their return. Upon this they abandoned Peloponnesus, and came to settle in the territories of the Athenians, where Hyllus, obedient to his father's commands, married Iole the daughter of Eurytus. Soon after he consulted the oracle, anxious to recover the Peloponnesus, and the ambiguity of the answer determined him to make a second attempt. He challenged to single combat Atreus, the successor of Eurystheus on the throne of Mycenæ, and it was mutally agreed that the undisturbed possession of the Peloponnesus should be ceded to whosoever defeated his adversary. Echemus accepted the challenge for Atreus, and Hyllus was killed, and the Heraclidæ a second time departed from Peloponnesus. Cleodæus the son of Hyllus, made a third attempt, and was equally unsuccessful, and his son Aristomachus some time after met with the same unfavorable reception and perished in the field of battle. Aristodemus, Temenus and Chresphontes, the three sons of Aristomachus, encouraged by the more expressive word of an oracle, and desirous to revenge the death of their progenitors, assembled a numerous force, and with a fleet invaded all Peloponnesus. Their expedition was attended with much success, and after some decisive battles they became masters of all the peninsula which they divided among themselves 8 years after. The recovery of the Peloponnesus by the descendants of Hercules forms an interesting epoch in antient history, which is universally believed to have happened 80 years after the Trojan war or 1104 years before the Christian era. This conquest was totally atchieved about 120 years after the first attempt of Hyllus. Apollod. 2, c. 7, &c.---Herodot. 9, c. 26.---Paus. 1, c. 17.---Paterc. 1, c. 2.---*Clemens Alex. Heraclides, a philosopher of Heraclea in Pontus, sometimes disciple of Seusippus and Aristotle. He wished it to be believed that he was carried into heaven the very day of his death, and the more firmly to render it credible, he begged one of his friends to put a serpent in his bed. The serpent disappointed him, and the noise which the number of visitors occasioned frightened him from the bed, before the philosopher had expired. Heraclitus, a celebrated Greek philosopher of Ephesus, who flourished about 500 years before the Christian era. His father's name was Hyson, or Heracion. Naturally of a melancholy disposition, he passed his time in a ſolitary and unſocial manner, and received the appellation of the obſcure philoſopher, and the mourner, from his unconquerable cuſtom of weeping at the follies, frailty, and viciſſitude of human affairs. He employed his time in writing different treatiſes, and one particularly, in which he ſupported that there was a fatal neceſſity, and that the world was created from fire, which he deemed a god omnipotent and omniſcient. His opinions about the origin of things were adopted by the Stoics, and Hippocrates entertained the ſame notions of a ſupreme power. Heraclitus deſerves the appellation of man hater for the ruſticity with which he anſwered the polite invitations of Darius king of Perſia. To remove himſelf totally from the ſociety of mankind, he retired to the mountains where for ſome time he fed on graſs in common with the wild inhabitants of the place. Such a diet was ſoon productive of a dropſical complaint, and the philoſopher condeſcended to reviſit the town. The enigmatical manner in which he conſulted the phyſicians made his applications unintelligible, and he was left to depend for cure only upon himſelf. He fixed his reſidence in a dunghill, in hopes that the continual warmth which proceeded from it might diſſipate the watery accumulation and reſtore him to the enjoyment of his former health. Such a remedy proved ineffectual, and the philoſopher deſpairing of a cure by the application of ox dung, ſuffered himſelf to die in the 60th year of his age. Some ſay that he was torn to pieces by dogs. Diog. in vitâ. — A Lyric poet. — A writer of Halicarnaſſus, intimate with Callimachus. Heræa, a town of Arcadia. — Feſtivals at Argos in honor of Juno, who was the patroneſs of that city. They were alſo obſerved by the colonies of the Argives which had been planted at Samos, and Ægina. There were always two proceſſions to the temple of the goddeſs without the city walls. The firſt was of the men in armour, the ſecond of the women, among whom the prieſteſs, a woman of the firſt quality, was drawn in a chariot by white oxen. The Argives always reckoned their years from her prieſthood, as the Athenians from their archons, or the Romans from their conſuls. When they came to the temple of the goddeſs they offered a hecatomb of oxen. Hence the ſacrifice is often called ἑκατομβία and ſometimes λεχέρνα, from λεχος a bed, becauſe Juno preſided over marriage, births, &c. There was a feſtival of the ſame name in Elis, celebrated every fifth year, in which ſixteen matrons wove a garment for the goddeſs. — There were alſo others inſtituted by Hippodamia, who had received aſſiſtance from Juno when ſhe married Pelops. Sixteen matrons, each attended by a maid, preſided at the celebration. The contenders were young virgins, who being divided in claſſes, according to their age, ran races each in their order, beginning with the youngeſt. The habit of all was exactly the ſame, their hair was diſhevelled, and their right ſhoulder bare to the breaſt, with coats reaching no lower than the knee. She who obtained the victory was rewarded with crowns of olive, and obtained a part of the ox that was offered in ſacrifice, and was permitted to dedicate her picture to the goddeſs. — There was alſo a ſolemn day of mourning at Corinth which bore the ſame name, in commemoration of Medea's children, who were buried in Juno's temple. They had been ſlain by the Corinthians; who, as it is reported, to avert the ſcandal which accompanied ſo barbarous a murder, preſented Euripides with a large ſum of money to write a play, in which Medea is repreſented as the murderer of her children. — Another feſtival of the ſame name at Pallene, with games in which the victor was rewarded with a garment.

Herculānēum, a town of Campania ſwallowed up by an earthquake; produced from an eruption of mount Veſuvius, A. D. 79, in the reign of Titus. After being buried under the lava for more than 1600 years this famous city was diſcovered in the beginning of the preſent century, and from the houſes and the ſtreets, which in great meaſure remain ſtill perfect, have been drawn buſts, ſtatues, manuſcripts, paintings, and utenſils, which do not a little contribute to enlarge our notions concerning the antients, and as it were bring us nearer to that time. Mela. 2, c. 4. — Paterc. 2, c. 16.

Hercŭles, a celebrated hero, who, after death, was ranked among the gods, and received divine honors. According to the antients there were many perſons of the ſame name. Diodorus mentions three, Cicero ſix, and ſome authors extend the number to no leſs than forty-three. Of all theſe the ſon of Jupiter and Alcmena, generally called the Theban, is the moſt celebrated, and to him, as may eaſily be imagined, the actions of the others have been attributed. The birth of

Hercules

Hercules was attended with many miraculous and ſupernatural events; and it is reported that Jupiter, who introduced himſelf to the bed of Alcmena, was employed for three nights in forming a child whom he intended to be the greateſt hero the world ever beheld. [Vid. Alcmena.] Hercules was brought up at Tirynthus; or, according to Diodorus, at Thebes, and before he had completed his eighth month, the jealouſy of Juno, intent upon his deſtruction, ſent two ſnakes to devour him. The child, not terrified at the ſight of the ſerpents, boldly ſeized them in both his hands and ſqueezed them to death, while his brother Iphiclus alarmed the houſe with his frightful ſhrieks. [Vid. Iphiclus.] He was early inſtructed in the liberal arts, and Caſtor the ſon of Tyndarus taught him how to fight, Eurytus how to ſhoot with a bow and arrows, Autolycus to drive a chariot, Linus to play on the lyre, and Eumolpus to ſing. He, like the reſt of his illuſtrious contemporaries, ſoon after became the pupil of the centaur Chiron, and under him he perfected and rendered himſelf the moſt valiant and accompliſhed of the age. In the 18th year of his age he reſolved to deliver the neighbourhood of mount Cithæron from a huge lion which preyed on the flocks of Amphitryon, his ſuppoſed father; and which laid waſte the adjacent country. He went to the court of Theſpius, king of Theſpis, who ſhared in the general calamity, and he received there a tender treatment, and was entertained during fifty days. The fifty daughters of the king became all mothers by Hercules, during his ſtay at Theſpis, and ſome ſay that it was effected in one night. After he had deſtroyed the lion of mount Cithæron, he delivered his country from the annual tribute of an hundred oxen which it paid to Erginus. [Vid. Erginus.] Such public ſervices became univerſally known, and Creon, who then ſat on the throne of Thebes, rewarded the patriotic deeds of Hercules by giving him his daughter in marriage, and entruſting him with the government of his kingdom. As Hercules by the will of Jupiter was ſubjected to the power of Euryſtheus, [Vid. Euryſtheus] and obliged to obey him in every reſpect, Euryſtheus acquainted with his ſucceſſes and riſing power, ordered him to appear at Mycenæ and perform the labors which by priority of birth he was empowered to impoſe upon him. Hercules refuſed, and Juno to puniſh his diſobedience, rendered him ſo delirious that he killed his own children by Megara, ſuppoſing them to be the offſpring of Euryſtheus. [Vid. Megara.] When he recovered the uſe of his ſenſes, he was ſo ſtruck with the misfortunes which had proceeded from his inſanity, that he concealed himſelf and retired from the ſociety of men for ſome time. He afterwards conſulted the oracle of Apollo, and was told that he muſt be ſubſervient for twelve years to the will of Euryſtheus, in compliance with the commands of Jupiter; and that after he had atchieved the moſt celebrated labors he ſhould be reckoned in the number of the gods. So plain and expreſſive an anſwer determined him to go to Mycenæ, and to bear with fortitude whatever gods or men impoſed upon him. Euryſtheus ſeeing ſo great a man totally ſubjected to him, and apprehenſive of ſo powerful an enemy, commanded him to atchieve a number of enterprizes the moſt difficult and arduous ever known, generally called the 12 labors of Hercules. The favors of the gods had completely armed him when he undertook his labors. He had received a coat of arms and helmet from Minerva, a ſword from Mercury, a horſe from Neptune, a ſhield from Jupiter, a bow and arrows from Apollo, and from Vulcan a golden cuiraſs and brazen buſkin, with a celebrated club of braſs according to the opinion of ſome writers.——The firſt labor impoſed upon Hercules by Euryſtheus, was to kill the lion of Nemæa, which ravaged the country near Mycenæ. The hero, unable to deſtroy him with his arrows, boldly attacked him with his club, purſued him to his den, and after a cloſe and ſharp engagement he choaked him to death. He carried the dead beaſt on his ſhoulders to Mycenæ, and ever after cloathed himſelf with the ſkin. Euryſtheus was ſo aſtoniſhed at the ſight of the beaſt, and at the courage of Hercules, that he ordered him never to enter the gates of the city when he returned from his expeditions, but to wait for his orders without the walls. He even made himſelf a brazen veſſel into which he retired whenever Hercules returned.——The ſecond labor of Hercules, was to deſtroy the Lernæan hydra, which had ſeven heads according to Apollodorus, 50 according to Simonides, and 100 according to Diodorus. This celebrated monſter he attacked with his arrows, and ſoon after he came to a cloſe engagement, and by means of his heavy club he deſtroyed the heads of his enemy. But this was productive of no advantage, for as ſoon as one head was beaten to pieces by the club, immediately two ſprang up, and the labor of Hercules would have remained unfiniſhed, had not he commanded his friend Iolas to burn, with a hot iron, the root of the head which he had cruſhed to pieces. This ſucceeded, [Vid. Hydra.] and Hercules became victorious, opened the belly of the monſter, and dipped his arrows in the gall to render the wounds which he he gave fatal and incurable.—He was ordered in his third labor to bring alive and unhurt into the preſence of Euryſtheus a ſtag, famous for its incredible ſwiftneſs, its golden horns, and brazen feet. This celebrated animal frequented the neighbourhood of Œnoe, and Hercules was employed for a whole year in continually purſuing it, and at laſt he caught it in a trap, or when tired, or according to others, by ſlightly wounding it and leſſening its ſwiftneſs. As he returned victorious Diana ſnatched the goat from him, and ſeverely reprimanded him for moleſting an animal which was ſacred to her. Hercules pleaded neceſſity, and by repreſenting the commands of Euryſtheus, he appeaſed the goddeſs and obtained the beaſt.—The fourth labor was to bring alive to Euryſtheus a wild boar which ravaged the neighbourhood of Erymanthus. In this expedition he deſtroyed the centaurs, [Vid. Centauri] and caught the boar by cloſely purſuing him through the deep ſnow. Euryſtheus was ſo frightened at the ſight of the boar, that, according to Diodorus, he hid himſelf in his brazen veſſel for ſome days.—In his fifth labor Hercules was ordered to clean the ſtables of Augias, where 3000 oxen had been confined for many years. [Vid. Augias.]—For his ſixth labor he was ordered to kill the carnivorous birds which ravaged the country near the lake Stymphalis in Arcadia. [Vid. Stymphalis.]—In his ſeventh labor he brought alive into Peloponneſus a prodigious wild bull which laid waſte the iſland of Crete.—In his eighth labor he was employed in obtaining the mares of Diomedes which fed upon human fleſh. He killed Diomedes and gave him to be eat by his mares which he brought to Euryſtheus. They were ſent to mount Olympus by the king of Mycenæ, where they were devoured by the wild beaſts; or, according to others, they were conſecrated to Jupiter, and their breed ſtill exiſted in the age of Alexander the Great.—For his ninth labor, he was commanded to obtain the girdle of the queen of the Amazons. [Vid. Hippolyte.]—In his tenth labor he killed the monſter Geryon, king of Gades, and brought to Argos his numerous flocks which fed upon human fleſh. [Vid. Geryon.]—The eleventh labor was to obtain apples from the garden of the Heſperides. [Vid. Heſperides.]—The twelfth and laſt, and moſt dangerous of his labors was to bring upon earth the three headed dog Cerberus. This was cheerfully undertaken by Hercules, and he deſcended into hell by a cave on mount Tænarus. He was permitted by Pluto to carry away his friends Theſeus and Pirithous, who were condemned to puniſhment in hell, and Cerberus alſo was granted to his prayers, provided he made uſe of no arms, but only force to drag him away. Hercules, as ſome report, carried him back to hell after he had brought him before Euryſtheus.—Beſides theſe arduous labors, which the jealouſy of Euryſtheus impoſed upon him, he alſo atchieved others of his own accord equally great and celebrated. [Vid. Cacus, Antæus, Buſiris, Eryx, &c.] He accompanied the Argonauts to Colchis before he delivered himſelf up to the king of Mycenæ. He aſſiſted the gods in their wars againſt the giants, and it was through him alone that Jupiter obtained a victory. [Vid. Gigantes.] He conquered Laomedon, and pillaged Troy. [Vid. Laomedon.] When Iole, the daughter of Eurytus, king of Œchalia, of whom he was deeply enamoured, was refuſed to his entreaties, he became the prey of a ſecond fit of inſanity, and he murdered Iphitus, the only one of the ſons of Eurytus who favored his addreſſes to Iole. [Vid. Iphitus] He was ſome time after purified of the murder, and his inſanity ceaſed, but the gods perſecuted him more and he was viſited by a diſorder which obliged him to apply to the oracle of Delphi for relief. The coldneſs with which the Pythia received him irritated him, and he reſolved to plunder Apollo's temple and carry away the ſacred tripod. Apollo oppoſed him, and a ſevere conflict was begun, which nothing but the interference of Jupiter with his thunderbolts could have prevented. He was upon this told by the oracle that he muſt be ſold as a ſlave, and remain three years in the moſt abject ſervitude to recover from his diſorder. He complied, and Mercury, by order of Jupiter, conducted him to Omphale, queen of Lydia, to whom he was ſold as a ſlave. Here he cleared all the country from robbers, and Omphale, who was aſtoniſhed at the greatneſs of his exploits, reſtored him to liberty, and married him. Hercules had Agelaus, and Lamon, according to others, by Omphale, from whom Cræſus, king of Lydia, was deſcended. He became alſo enamoured of one of Omphale's female ſervants, by whom he had Alceus. After he had completed the years of his ſlavery, he returned to Peloponneſus, where he reeſtabliſhed on the throne of Sparta Tyndarus, who had been expelled by Hippocoon. He became one of Dejanira's ſuitors, and married her after he had overcome all his rivals. [Vid. Achelous.] He was obliged to leave Calydon his father-in-law's kingdom, becauſe he had inadvertently killed a man with a blow of his fiſt, and it was on account of this expulſion that he was not preſent ſent at the hunting of the Calydonian boar. From Calydon he retired to the court of Ceyx, king of Trachinia. In his way he was ſtopped by the ſwollen ſtreams of the Evenus, where the centaur Neſſus attempted to offer violence to Dejanira, under the perfidious pretence of conveying her over the river. Hercules perceived the diſtreſs of Dejanira, and killed the centaur, who as he expired gave her a tunic, which as he obſerved had the power of recalling a huſband from unlawful love. [Vid. Dejanira.] Ceyx, king of Trachinia, received him and his wife with great marks of friendſhip and purified him of the murder which he had committed at Calydon. Hercules was ſtill mindful that he had once been refuſed the hand of Iole, he therefore made war againſt her father Eurytus, and killed him, with three of his ſons. Iole fell into the hands of her father's murderer, and found that ſhe was loved by Hercules as much as before. She accompanied him on mount Œta, where he was going to raiſe an altar and offer a ſolemn ſacrifice to Jupiter. As he had not then the tunic in which he arrayed himſelf to offer a ſacrifice, he ſent Lichas to Dejanira in order to provide himſelf a proper dreſs. Dejanira informed of her huſband's tender attachment to Iole, ſent him a philter, or more probably the tunic which ſhe had received from Neſſus, and Hercules as ſoon as he had put it on fell into a deſperate diſtemper, and found the poiſon of the Lernæan hydra penetrate through his bones. He attempted to pull off the fatal dreſs, but it was too late, and in the midſt of his pains and tortures he inveighed in the moſt bitter imprecations againſt the credulous Dejanira, the cruelty of Euryſtheus, and the jealouſy and hatred of Juno. As the diſtemper was incurable, he implored the protection of Jupiter, and gave his bow and arrows to Philoctetes, and erected a large burning pile on the top of mount Œta. He ſpread on the pile the ſkin of the Nemæan lion, and laid himſelf down upon it as on a bed, leaning his head on his club. Philoctetes, or according to others, Pæan or Hyllus, was ordered to ſet fire to the pile, and the hero ſaw himſelf on a ſudden ſurrounded with the flames, without betraying any marks of fear or aſtoniſhment. Jupiter ſaw him from heaven, and told to the ſurrounding gods that he would raiſe to the ſkies the immortal parts of a hero who had cleared the earth from ſo many monſters and tyrants. The gods applauded Jupiter's reſolution, the burning pile was ſuddenly ſurrounded with a dark ſmoke, and after the mortal parts of Hercules were conſumed, he was carried up to heaven in a chariot drawn by four horſes. Some loud claps of thunder accompanied his elevation, and his friends, unable to find either his bones or aſhes, ſhowed their gratitude to his memory by raiſing an altar where the burning pile had ſtood. Menœtius, the ſon of Actor, offered him a ſacrifice of a bull, a wild boar, and a goat, and enjoined the people of Opus yearly to obſerve the ſame religious ceremonies. His worſhip ſoon became as univerſal as his fame, and Juno, who had once perſecuted him with ſuch inveterate fury, forgot her reſentment, and gave him her daughter Hebe in marriage. Hercules has received many ſirnames and epithets, either from the place where his worſhip was eſtabliſhed, or from the labors which he atchieved. His temples were numerous and magnificent, and his divinity revered. No dogs or flies ever entered his temple at Rome, and that of Gades, according to Strabo, was always forbidden to women and pigs. The Phœnicians offered quails on his altars, and as it was ſuppoſed that he preſided over dreams, the ſick and infirm were ſent to ſleep in his temples, that they might receive in their dreams the agreeable preſages of their approaching recovery. The white poplar was particularly dedicated to his ſervice. Hercules is generally repreſented naked, with ſtrong and well proportioned limbs, he is ſometimes covered with the ſkin of the Nemæan lion, and holds a knotted club in his hand, on which he often leans. Sometimes he appears crowned with the leaves of the poplar, and holding the corn of plenty under his arm. At other times he is repreſented ſtanding with Cupid, who inſolently breaks to pieces his arrows and his club, to intimate the paſſion of love in the hero, who ſuffered himſelf to be beaten and ridiculed by Omphale, who dreſſed herſelf in his armour while he was ſitting to ſpin with her female ſervants. The children of Hercules are as numerous as the labors and difficulties which he underwent, and indeed they became ſo powerful ſoon after his death, that they alone had the courage to invade all Peloponneſus. [Vid. Heraclidæ.] He was father of Deicoon and Therimachus, by Megara; of Cteſippus, by Aſtydamia; of Palemon, by Autonoe; of Everes, by Parthenope; of Glyciſonetes, Gyneus and Odites, by Dejanira; of Theſſalus, by Chalciope; of Theſtalus, by Epicaſte; of Tlepolemus, by Aſtyoche; of Agathyrſus, Gelon, and Scytha, by Echidna, &c. Such are the moſt ſtriking characteriſtics of the life of Hercules, who is ſaid to have ſupported for a while the weight of the heavens upon his ſhoulders, [Vid. Atlas] and to have ſeparated by the force of his arm the celebrated mountains which were afterwards called the boundaries of his labors. [Vid. Abyla]

Abyla.] He is held out by the antients as a true pattern of virtue and piety, and as his whole life had been employed for the common benefit of mankind, he was deservedly rewarded with immortality. Hermaphrŏditus, a son of Venus and Mercury educated on mount Ida by the Naiades. At the age of 15 he began to travel to gratify his curiosity. When he came to Caria, he bathed himself in a fountain, and Salmacis, the nymph who presided over it, became enamoured of him and attempted to seduce him. Hermaphroditus continued deaf to all entreaties and offers, and Salmacis, endeavouring to obtain by force what was denied to prayers, closely embraced him and entreated the gods to make them two but one body. Her prayers were heard, and Salmacis and Hermaphroditus now two in one body, still preserved the characteristics of both their sexes. Hermaphroditus begged the gods that all who bathed in that fountain might become effeminate. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 347.—Hygin. fab. 271.

Pyrrhus, at his return from Troy, carried home Hermione and married her. Hermione tenderly attached to her couſin Oreſtes, looked upon Pyrrhus with horror and indignation. According to others, however, Hermione received the addreſſes of Pyrrhus with pleaſure, and even reproached Andromache, his concubine with ſtealing his affections from her. Her jealouſy for Andromache, according to ſome, induced her to unite herſelf to Oreſtes, and to deſtroy Pyrrhus. Hermolăus, a young Macedonian among the attendants of Alexander. As he was one day hunting with the king he killed a wild boar which was coming towards him. Alexander, who followed cloſe behind him, was ſo diſappointed becauſe the beaſt had been killed before he could dart at it, that he ordered Hermolaus to be ſeverely whipped. This treatment irritated Hermolaus, and he conſpired to take away the king's life, with others who were diſpleaſed with the cruel treatment he had received. The plot was diſcovered by one of the conſpirators, and Alexander ſeized them and aſked what had impelled them to conſpire to take his life. Hermolaus anſwered for the reſt, and obſerved that it was unworthy of Alexander to treat his moſt faithful and attached friends like ſlaves, and to ſhed their blood without the leaſt mercy. Alexander ordered him to be put to death. Curt. 8, c. 6.

Hermotimus, a famous prophet of Clazomenæ. It is ſaid that his ſoul ſeparated itſelf from his body, and wandered in every part of the earth to explain futurity, after which it returned again and animated his frame. His wife who was acquainted with the frequent abſence of his ſoul, took advantage of it and burnt his body, as if totally dead, and deprived the ſoul of its natural receptacle. Hermotimus received divine honors in a temple at Clazomenæ, into which it was unlawful for women to enter. Plin. 7, c. 52, &c.—Lucian.

Hermundŭri, a people of Germany, ſubdued by Aurelius.

Hermus, a river of Aſia Minor, whoſe ſands, according to the poets, were covered with gold. It flows near Sardes and receives the waters of the Pactolus and Hyllus, after which it falls into the Ægean ſea. It is now called Sarabat. Virg. G. 2, v. 137.—Martial 8, ep. 78.

Hernĭci, a people of Campania, celebrated for their inveterate enmity to the riſing power of Rome. Liv. 1. &c.—Dionyſ. Hal. 8. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 684.

Hero, a beautiful prieſteſs of Venus at Seſtos, greatly enamoured of Leander, a youth of Abydos. Theſe two lovers were ſo faithful to one another, that Leander in the night eſcaped from the vigilance of his family, and ſwam acroſs the Helleſpont, while Hero in Seſtos directed his courſe by holding a burning torch on the top of a high tower. After many interviews of mutual affection and tenderneſs, Leander was drowned in a tempeſtuous night as he attempted his uſual courſe, and Hero in deſpair threw herſelf down from her tower and periſhed in the ſea. Muſæus de Leand. & Hero—Ovid. Heroid. 17 & 18.—Virg. G. 3, v. 258.

Herōdes, ſirnamed the Great, followed the intereſt of Brutus and Caſſius, and afterwards that of Antony. He was made king of Judæa by means of Antony, and after the battle of Actium he was continued in his power by his flattery and ſubmiſſion to Auguſtus. He rendered himſelf odious by his cruelty, and as he knew that the day of his death would become a day of mirth and feſtivity, he ordered the moſt illuſtrious of his ſubjects to be confined and murdered the very moment that he expired, that every eye in the kingdom might ſeem to ſhed tears at the death of Herod. He died in the 70th year of his age, after a reign of 40 years. Joſephus.—Antipas, a ſon of Herod the Great, governor of Galilæa, &c, —Agrippa, a Jew, intimate with the emperor Caligula, &c. This name was common to many of the Jews. Joſephus.

Herodiānus, a Greek hiſtorian who floriſhed A. D. 247. He was born at Alexandria, and he was employed among the officers of the Roman emperors. He wrote a Roman hiſtory in eight books from the death of Marcus Aurelius to Maximinus. His ſtyle is peculiarly elegant, but it wants preciſion, and the work too plainly betrays that the author was not a perfect maſter of geography. He is accuſed of being too partial to Maximinus, and too ſevere upon Alexander Severus. His book comprehends the hiſtory of 68 or 70 years, and he aſſerts that he has been an eye-witneſs of whatever he has written. The beſt editions of his hiſtory is that of Politian, 4to. Dovan, 1525, who afterwards publiſhed a very valuable Latin tranſlation, and that of Oxford, 8vo. 1708.

Herodicus, a phyſician ſirnamed Gymnaſtic, who floriſhed, B. C. 443.—A grammarian ſirnamed Crateteus, B. C. 223.

Herŏdŏtus, a celebrated hiſtorian of Halicarnaſſus, whoſe father's name was Lyxes, and that of his mother's Dryo. He fled to Samos when his country labored under the oppreſſive tyranny of Lygdamis, and travelled over Egypt, Italy, and all Greece. He afterwards returned to Halicarnaſſus, and expelled the tyrant, which patriotic deed, far from gaining the eſteem and admiration of the populace, diſpleaſed and irritated them, ſo that Herodotus was obliged to fly into Greece from the public reſentment. To procure a laſting fame he publicly repeated at the Olympic games, the hiſtory which he had compoſed in his 39th year, B. C. 445. It was received with ſuch univerſal applauſe that the names of the nine Muſes were unanimouſly given to the nine books into which it is divided. This celebrated compoſition, which has procured its author the title of father of hiſtory, is written in the Ionic dialect. Herodotus is among the hiſtorians what Homer is among the poets, and Demoſthenes among the orators. His ſtyle abounds with elegance, eaſe, and ſweetneſs, and if there is any of the fabulous or incredible, the author candidly informs the reader that it is introduced upon the narration of others. The work is an hiſtory of the wars of the Perſians againſt the Greeks, from the age of Cyrus to the battle of Mycale in the reign of Xerxes, and beſides this it gives an account of the moſt celebrated nations in the world. Herodotus had written another hiſtory of Aſſyria and Arabia, which is not extant. The life of Homer, generally attributed to him, is ſuppoſed by ſome not to be the production of his pen. Plutarch has accuſed him of malevolence towards the Greeks: an imputation which can eaſily be refuted. The two beſt editions of this great hiſtorian are that of Weſſeling, fol. Amſterdam, 1763, and that of Glaſgow, 9 vols. 12mo. 1761. Cic. de leg.

lg. 1. de erat. 2.—Dionyſ. Hal. 1.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Plut. de mal. Herod.——A man who wrote a treatiſe concerning Epicurus. Diog.——A Theban wreſtler of Megara, in the age of Demetrius, ſon of Antigonus. He was ſix feet and a half in height, and he ate generally twenty pounds of fleſh, with bread in proportion, at each of his meals.

HEROES, a name which was given by the ancients to ſuch as were born from a god, or to ſuch as had ſignalized themſelves by their actions, and ſeemed to deſerve immortality by the ſervice they had rendered their country. The heroes which Homer deſcribes, ſuch as Ajax, Achilles, were of ſuch a prodigious ſtrength, that they could lift up and throw ſtones which the united force of four or five men of his age could not have moved. The heroes were ſuppoſed to be intereſted in the affairs of mankind after death, and they were invoked with much ſolemnity. As the altars of the gods were crouded with ſacrifices and libations, ſo the heroes were often honored with a funeral ſolemnity, in which their great exploits were enumerated. The origin of heroiſm might proceed from the opinions of ſome philoſophers who taught that the ſouls of great men were often raiſed to the ſtars, and introduced among the immortal gods. According to the notions of the Stoics, the ancient heroes inhabited a pure and ſerene climate, ſituate above the moon.

HERŌIS, a feſtival, celebrated every 9th year by the Delphians, in honor of a heroine. There were in the celebration a great number of myſterious rites, with a repreſentation of ſomething like Semele's reſurrection.

HERON, two mathematicians, one of whom is called the ancient and the other the younger. The former, who lived about 100 years before Chriſt, was diſciple of Cteſibius, and wrote a curious book, tranſlated into Latin, under the title of Spiritalium Liber; the only edition of which is that of Baldus, Aug. Vind. 1616.

HERŌPHILA, a Sibyl, who, as ſome ſuppoſe, came to Rome in the reign of Tarquin. (Vid. Sibyllæ.) Pauſ. 10, c. 12.

HEROPHILUS, an impoſtor in the reign of J. Cæſar, who pretended to be the grandſon of Marius. He was baniſhed from Rome by Cæſar, for his ſeditions, and was afterwards ſtrangled in priſon.——A Greek phyſician, about 570 years before the Chriſtian era. He was one of the firſt who diſſected bodies. Pliny, Cicero, and Plutarch, have greatly commended him.

HEROSTRĂTUS. Vid. Eroſtratus.

HERPA, a town of Cappadocia.

HERSE, a daughter of Cecrops, king of Athens, beloved by Mercury. The god diſcloſed his love to Aglauros, Herſe's ſiſter, in hopes of procuring an eaſy admiſſion to Herſe, but Aglauros, through jealouſy, diſcovered the amour. Mercury was ſo offended at her behaviour, that he ſtruck her with his caduceus and changed her into a ſtone. Herſe became mother of Cephalus by Mercury, and, after death, ſhe received divine honors at Athens. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 559, &c.——A wife of Danaus. Apollod.

HERSILIA, one of the Sabines carried away by the Romans at the celebration of the Conſualia. She was given and married to Romulus; and, being preſented with immortality by Juno, received divine honors under the name of Ora. Liv. 1, c. 11.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 832.

HERTHA & HERTA, a goddeſs among the Germans ſuppoſed to be the ſame as the earth. She had a temple and a chariot dedicated to her ſervice in a remote iſland, and was ſuppoſed to viſit the earth at ſtated times, when her coming was celebrated with the greateſt rejoicings and feſtivity. Tacit. de Germ.

HERŬLI, a ſavage nation in the northern parts of Europe, who attacked the Roman power in its decline.

HESÆNUS, a mountain near Pæonia.

HESIŎDUS, a celebrated poet, born at Aſcra, in Bœotia. His father's name was Dius, and his mother's Pycimede. He lived in the age of Homer, and even obtained a poetical prize in competition with him, according to Varro and Plutarch. Quintilian, Philoſtratus, and others, maintain, that Heſiod lived before the age of Homer; but Val. Paterculus, &c. ſupport that he floriſhed about 100 years after him. Heſiod is the firſt who wrote a poem on agriculture. This compoſition is called, The Works and the Days; and, beſides the inſtructions which are given to the cultivator of the field, the reader is pleaſed to find many moral reflections worthy of a refined Socrates or a Plato. His Theogony is a miſcellaneous narration executed without art, preciſion, choice, judgment, or connection, yet it is the more valuable for the faithful account it gives of the gods of antiquity. His Shield of Hercules is but a fragment of a larger poem, in which it is ſuppoſed he gave an account of the moſt celebrated heroines among the ancients. Heſiod, without being maſter of the fire and ſublimity of Homer, is admired for the elegance of his diction, and the ſweetneſs of his poetry. Beſides theſe poems he wrote others, now loſt. Pauſanias ſays, that, in his age, Heſiod's verſes were ſtill written on tablets in the temple of the Muſes, of which the poet was a prieſt. If we believe Clem. Alexand. 6, Strom. the poet borrowed much from Muſæus. One of Lucian's dialogues, bears the name of Heſiod, and, in it, the poet is introduced as ſpeaking of himſelf. Virgil, in his Georgics, has imitated the compoſitions of Heſiod, and taken his opera and dies for model, as he acknowledges.

knowledges. Cicero ſtrongly commends him, and the Greeks were ſo partial to his poetry and moral inſtructions that they ordered their children to learn all by heart. Heſiod was murdered by the ſons of Ganyctor of Naupactum, and his body was thrown into the ſea. Some dolphins brought back the body to the ſhore, which was immediately known, and the murderers were diſcovered by the poet's dogs, and thrown into the ſea. If Heſiod floriſhed in the age of Homer, he lived 907 B. C. The beſt editions of this poet are that of Robinſon, 4to, Oxon. 1737, that of Loeſner, 8vo, Lipſ. 1778, and that of Parma, 4to, 1785. Cic. Fam. 6, ep. 18.—Pauſ. 9, c. 3, &c.—Quintil. 10. c. 1.—Paterc.—Varro.—Plut. de 7, Sep. & de Anim. Sag.

Hesiŏne, a daughter of Laomedon, king of Troy, by Strymo, the daughter of the Scamander. It having fallen to her lot to be expoſed to a ſea monſter, to whom the Trojans yearly preſented a marriageable virgin, to appeaſe the reſentment of Apollo and Neptune, whom Laomedon had offended, Hercules promiſed to deliver her, provided he received as a reward ſix beautiful horſes. Laomedon conſented, and Hercules attacked the monſter juſt as he was going to devour Heſione, and he killed him with his club. Laomedon, however, refuſed to reward the hero's ſervices, and Hercules, incenſed at his treachery, beſieged Troy, and put the king and all his family to the ſword, except Podarces, or Priam, who had adviſed his father to give the promiſed horſes to his ſiſter's deliverer. The conqueror gave Heſione in marriage to his friend Telamon, who had aſſiſted him during the war, and he eſtabliſhed Priam upon his father's throne. The removal of Heſione to Greece proved at laſt fatal to the Trojans, and Priam, who remembered with indignation that his ſiſter had been forcibly given to a foreigner, ſent his ſon Paris to Greece to reclaim the poſſeſſions of Heſione, or more probably to revenge his injuries upon the Greeks by carrying away Helen, which gave riſe, ſoon after, to the Trojan war. Lycophron mentions, that Hercules threw himſelf, armed from head to foot, into the mouth of the monſter to which Heſione was expoſed, and that he tore his belly to pieces, and came out ſafe, only with the loſs of his hair, after a confinement of three days. Homer. Il. 5.—Apollod. 2, c. 5, &c.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 212. ——The wife of Nauplius.

Hesperia, a large iſland of Africa, once the reſidence of the Amazons. Diod. 3.—— A name common both to Italy and Spain. It is derived from Heſper or Veſper, the ſetting ſun, or the evening, whence the Greeks called Italy Heſperia, becauſe it was ſituate at the ſetting ſun, or in the weſt. The ſame name, for ſimilar reaſons, was applied to Spain by the Latins. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 634, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 36.——A daughter of the Oceanus. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 769.

Hesperides, three celebrated nymphs, daughters of Heſperus. Apollodorus mentions four, Ægle, Erythia, Veſta, and Arethuſa; and Diodorus confounds them with the Atlantides, and ſuppoſes that they were the ſame number. They were appointed to guard the golden apples which Juno gave to Jupiter on the day of their nuptials, and the place of their reſidence placed beyond the ocean by Heſiod, is more univerſally believed to be near mount Atlas in Africa, according to Apollodorus. This celebrated place or garden abounded with fruits of the moſt delicious kind, and was carefully guarded by a dreadful dragon which never ſlept. It was one of the labors of Hercules to procure ſome of the golden apples of the Heſperides. The hero, ignorant of the ſituation of this celebrated garden, applied to the nymphs in the neighbourhood of the Po for information, and was told that Nereus, the god of the ſea, if properly managed, [Vid. Nereus] would direct him in his purſuits. Hercules ſeized Nereus as he was aſleep, and the ſea god, unable to eſcape from his graſp, anſwered all the queſtions which he propoſed. Some ſay that Nereus ſent Hercules to Prometheus, and that from him he received all his information. When Hercules came into Africa, he repaired to Atlas, and demanded of him three of the golden apples. Atlas unloaded himſelf, and placed the burden of the heavens on the ſhoulders of Hercules, while he went in queſt of the apples. At his return, Hercules expreſſed his wiſh to eaſe his burden by putting ſomething on his head, and, when Atlas aſſiſted him to remove his inconvenience, Hercules artfully left the burden, and ſeized the apples, which Atlas had thrown on the ground. According to other accounts, Hercules gathered the apples himſelf, without the aſſiſtance of Atlas, and he previouſly killed the watchful dragon which kept the tree. Theſe apples were brought to Euryſtheus, and afterwards carried back by Minerva into the garden of the Heſperides, as they could be preſerved in no other place. Hercules is ſometimes repreſented gathering the apples, and the dragon which guarded the tree appears bowing down his head, as having received a mortal wound. This monſter, as it is ſuppoſed, was the offſpring of Typhon, and it had a hundred heads and as many voices. This number, however, is reduced by ſome to only one head. Thoſe that attempt to explain mythology, obſerve, that the Heſperides were certain perſons who had an immenſe number of flocks, and that the ambiguous word μηλον, which ſignifies an apple and a ſheep, gave riſe to the fable of the golden ap-HESYCHIUS, the author of a Greek lexicon in the beginning of the 3d century; a valuable work, which has been learnedly edited by Albert, 2 vols. fol. L. Bat. 1746.

HETRICŬLUM, a town in the country of the Brutii. Liv. 30, c. 19.

HETRŪRIA & ETRURIA, a celebrated country of Italy, at the weſt of the Tyber. It originally contained twelve different nations, which had each their reſpective monarch. Their names were Veientes, Cluſini, Perufini, Cortonenſes, Arretini, Vetuloni, Volaterrani, Ruſellani, Volſcinii, Tarquinii, Faliſci, and Cæretani. The inhabitants were particularly famous for their ſuperſtition, and ſtrict confidence in omens, dreams, auguries, &c. They all proved powerful and reſolute enemies to the riſing empire of the Romans, and were conquered only after much effuſion of blood. Plin. 3. c. 5.—Strab. 5.—Plut. in Rom.—Mela. 2, c. 4.

HEURIPPA, a ſurname of Diana.

HEXAPŸLUM, a certain eminence at Syracuſe. Liv. 24, c. 21.

HIBERNIA & HYBERNIA, a large iſland at the weſt of Britain, now called Ireland. Some of the ancients have called it Ibernia, Juverna, &c. Juv. 2, v. 160.—Strab. 4.—Orpheus.—Ariſtot.

HIERA, a beautiful woman, who married Telephus, king of Myſia.——The mother of Pandarus and Bitias, by Alcanor. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 673.——One of the Æolian iſlands. Pauſ. 10, c. 11.

HIERAPŎLIS, a town of Syria.——Another of Phrygia.——Another of Crete.

HIĔRAX, a youth who awoke Argus to inform him that Mercury was ſtealing Io. Mercury killed him, and changed him into a bird of prey. Apollod. 2, c. 1.——Antiochus, king of Syria, and brother to Seleucus, received the ſurname of Hierax. Juſtin. 27. c. 3——An Egyptian philoſopher in the third century.

HIĔRO 1ſt, a king of Syracuſe, after his brother Gelon, who rendered himſelf odious in the beginning of his reign by his cruelty and avarice. He made war againſt Theron, the tyrant of Agrigentum, and took Himera. He obtained three different crowns at the Olympic games, two in horſe races, and one at a chariot race. Pindar has celebrated him as being victorious at Olympia. In the latter part of his reign the converſation of Simonides, Epicharmus, Pindar, &c. ſoftened in ſome meaſure the roughneſs of his morals, and rendered him the patron of learning, genius, and merit. He died, after a reign of 18 years, B. C. 467, leaving the crown to his brother Thraſybulus, who diſgraced himſelf by his vices and tyranny. Died. 11.——The ſecond of that name, king of Syracuſe, was deſcended from Gelon. He was unanimouſly elected king by all the ſtates of the iſland of Sicily, and appointed to carry on the war againſt the Carthaginians. He joined his enemies in beſieging Meſſana, which had ſurrendered to the Romans, but he was beaten by Appius Claudius, the Roman conſul, and obliged to retire to Syracuſe, where he was ſoon blocked up. Seeing all hopes of victory loſt, he made peace with the Romans, and proved ſo faithful to his engagements during the fifty-nine years of his reign, that the Romans never had a more firm, or more attached, ally. He died in the 94th year of his age, about 225 years before the Chriſtian era. He was univerſally regretted, and all the Sicilians ſhowed, by their lamentations, that they had loſt a common father and friend. He liberally patroniſed the learned, and employed the talents of Archimedes for the good of his country. He wrote a book on agriculture, now loſt. He was ſucceeded by Hieronymus. *Ælian. V. HIEROCEPIA, an iſland near Paphos in Cyprus.

HIEROCLES, a perſecutor of the Chriſtians under Diocleſian, who pretended to find inconſiſtencies in Scripture, and preferred the miracles of Thyaneus to thoſe of Chriſt. His writings were refuted by Lactantius and Euſebius.——A Platonic philoſopher, who taught at Alexandria, and wrote a book on providence and fate, fragments of which are preſerved by Photius; a commentary on the golden verſes of Pythagoras; and facetious moral verſes. He floriſhed A. D. 485. The beſt edition is that of Aſheton and Warren, 8vo. London, 1742.——A general in the intereſt of Demetrius. Polyæn. 5.——A governor of Bithynia and Alexandria, under Diocletian.—— An officer. Vid. Heliogabalus.

HIERODŪLUM, a town of Libya.

HIERONĬCA LEX, by Hiero, tyrant of Sicily, to ſettle the quantity of corn, the price and time of receiving it between the farmers of Sicily and the collectors of the corn tax at Rome. This law, on account of its juſtice and candor, was continued by the Romans, when they became maſters of Sicily.

HIERONŸMUS, a tyrant of Sicily, who ſucceeded his father or grandfather Hiero, when only fifteen years old. He rendered himſelf odious by his cruelty, oppreſſion, and debauchery. He abjured the alliance of Rome, which Hiero had enjoyed with ſo much honor and advantage. He was aſſaſſinated, and all his family was overwhelmed in his fall, and totally extirpated, B. C. 214. ——An hiſtorian of Rhodes, who wrote an account of the actions of Demetrius Poliorcetes, by whom he was appointed over Bœotia, B. C. 254. Plut. in Dem.——An Athenian ſet over the fleet, while Conon went to the king of Perſia.——A Chriſtian writer, commonly called St. Jerome, born in Pannonia, and diſtinguiſhed for his zeal againſt heretics. He wrote commentaries on the Prophets, St. Matthew's Goſpel, &c. a Latin verſion, known by the name of Vulgate, polemical treatiſes, and an account of eccleſiaſtical writers before him. Of his works, which are replete with lively animation, ſublimity, and erudition, the beſt edition is that of Vallarſius, fol. Veronæ, 1734 to 1740, 10 vols. Jerome died A. D. 420, in his 80th year.

HIEROPHĬLUS, a Greek phyſician. He inſtructed his daughter Agnodice in the art of midwifery, &c. Vid. Agnodice.

HIEROSOLŸMA, a celebrated city of Paleſtine, the capital of Judæa, taken by Pompey, who, on that account, is ſirnamed Hieroſolymarius. Titus alſo took it and deſtroyed it the 8th of September, A. D. 70. Cic. ad Attic. 2.

HIGNATIA VIA, a large road which led from the Ionian ſea to the Helleſpont, acroſs Macedonia, about 530 miles. Strab. 7.

HILARIA, a daughter of Leucippus and Philodice. As ſhe and her ſiſter Phœbe were going to marry their couſins Lynceus and Idas, they were carried away by Caſtor and Pollux, who married them. Hilaria had Anagon by Caſtor. Pauſ. 2, c. 22. l. 3. c. 19.—— Feſtivals at Rome in honor of the mother of the gods.

HILARIUS, a biſhop of Poictiers, in France, who wrote ſeveral treatiſes, the moſt famous of which is on the Trinity, in twelve books. The only edition is that of the Benedictin monks, fol. Paris, 1693. Hilary died A. D. 372, in his 80th year.

HIMELLA, a ſmall river in the country of the Sabines. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 714.

HIMĔRA, a city of Sicily, built by the people of Zancle, and deſtroyed by the Carthaginians 240 years after. Strab. 6.—— There were two rivers of Sicily of the ſame name.——The ancient name of the Eurotas. Strab. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Polyb.

HIMILCO, a Carthaginian ſent to explore the weſtern parts of Europe. Feſt. Avien.—— A ſon of Amilcar, who ſucceeded his father in the command of the Carthaginian armies in Sicily. He died, with his army, by a plague, B. C. 398. Juſtin. 19, c. 2.

HIPPAGŌRAS, a man who wrote an account of the republic of Carthage.

HIPPALCIMUS, a ſon of Pelops and Hippodamia, who was among the Argonauts.

HIPPALUS, the firſt who ſailed in open ſea from Arabia to India. Arrian. in peripl.

HIPPARCHIA, a woman in Alexander's age, who became enamoured of Crates, the Cynic philoſopher, becauſe ſhe had heard him diſcourſe. She married him, though he at firſt diſdained her addreſſes, and repreſented his poverty and meanneſs. She was ſo attached to him that ſhe was his conſtant companion, and was not aſhamed publicly to gratify his impureſt deſires. She wrote ſome things, now loſt. Vid. Crates.

HIPPARCHUS, a ſon of Piſiſtratus, who ſucceeded his father as tyrant of Athens, with his brother Hippias. He patronized ſome of the learned men of the age, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his fondneſs for literature. The ſeduction of a ſiſter of Harmodius raiſed him many enemies, and he was at laſt aſſaſſinated by a deſperate band of conſpirators, with Harmodius and Ariſtogiton at their head, 513 years before Chriſt.——One of Antony's freedmen.——The firſt perſon who was baniſhed by oſtraciſm at Athens.——The father of Aſclepiades.——A mathematician and aſtronomer of Nicæa, who publiſhed different treatiſes and obſervations upon the ſtars, and was the firſt who, after Thales and Sulpicius Gallus, found out the exact time of eclipſes, of which he made a calculation for 600 years. He publiſhed an account of the ſtars, to which he gave a name, and which he numbered and aſterwards divided into different claſſes; and died B. C. 125. Plin. 2, c. 26, &c.——An Athenian who conſpired againſt Heraclides, who kept Athens for Demetrius, &c. Polyæn. 5.

HIPPARINUS, a ſon of Dionyſius, who ejected Callipus from Syracuſe, and ſeized the ſovereign power for twenty-ſeven years. Polyæn. 5.——The father of Dion.

HIPPARION, one of Dion's ſons.

HIPPASUS, a ſon of Ceyx, who aſſiſted Hercules againſt Eurytus. Apollod. 2, c. 7.——A pupil of Pythagoras. Diog.——A centaur, killed at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 352.——An illegitimate ſon of Priam. Hygin. fab. 90.

HIPPEUS, an illegitimate ſon of Hercules by a daughter of Theſtius. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

HIPPI, four ſmall iſlands near Erythræ.

HIPPIA, a laſcivious woman, &c. Juv. 6, v. 82.

HIPPIA, a philoſopher of Elis, who maintained that virtue conſiſted in not being in want of the aſſiſtance of men. At the Olympic games he boaſted that he was maſter of all the liberal and mechanical arts; and he ſaid that the ring upon his finger, the tunic, cloak, and ſhoes, which he then wore, were all the work of his own hands. Cic. de orat. 3.——A ſon of Piſiſtratus, who became tyrant of Athens after the death of his father, with his brother Hipparchus. He was willing to revenge the death of his brother, who had been aſſaſſinated, and for this violent meaſure he was driven from his country. He fled to king Darius in Perſia, and was killed at the battle of Marathon, fighting againſt the Athenians, B. C. 490. He had five children by Myrrhine, the daughter of Callias. Herodot. 6.—Thucyd. 7.

HIPPIS, an hiſtorian and poet of Rhegium, in the reign of Xerxes. Ælian. 8, H. An. c. 33.

HIPPIUS, a ſirname of Neptune.

HIPPO, a daughter of Scedaſus, who, upon being raviſhed by the ambaſſadors of Sparta, killed herſelf, curſing the city that gave birth to ſuch men. Pauſ. 9, c. 13.——A celebrated town of Africa, on the Mediterranean. Jul. 3, v. 252.——Strabo, 17, ſays that there are two of the ſame name in Africa.

HIPPOBOTES, a large meadow near the Caſpian ſea, where 50,000 horſes could graze.

HIPPOBOTUS, a Greek hiſtorian, who compoſed a treatiſe on philoſophers. Diog. in Pyth.

HIPPOCENTAURI, a race of monſters who dwelt in Theſſaly. Vid. Centauri.

HIPPOCOON, a ſon of Œbalus, brother to Tyndarus. He was put to death by Hercules, becauſe he had driven his brother from the kingdom of Lacedæmon. He was at the chace of the Calydonian boar. Diod. 4.—Apollod. 2, c. &c 1. 3, c. 10.—Pauſ. Lacon.—Ovid Met. 8, v. 314.——A friend of Æneas, ſon of Hyrtacus, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the funeral games of Sicily. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 492, &c.

HIPPOCORYSTES, a ſon of Ægyptus.—of Hippocoon. Apollod.

HIPPOCRATES, a celebrated phyſician of Cos, one of the Cyclades. He ſtudied phyſic, in which his grandfather Nebrus was ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed; and he improved himſelf by reading the tablets in the temples of the gods, where each individual had written down the diſeaſes under which he had labored, and the means by which he had recovered. He delivered Athens from a dreadful peſtilence in the beginning of the Peloponneſian war, and he was publicly rewarded with a golden crown, the privileges of a citizen of Athens, and the initiation at the grand feſtivals. Skilful and diligent in his profeſſion, he openly declared the meaſures which he had taken to cure a diſeaſe, and candidly confeſſes that of 42 patients which were entruſted to his care, only 17 had recovered, and the reſt had fallen a prey to the diſtemper in ſpite of his medical applications. He devoted all his time for the ſervice of his country; and when Artaxerxes invited him, even by force of arms, to come to his court, Hippocrates firmly and modeſtly anſwered, that he was born to ſerve his countrymen, and not a foreigner. He enjoyed the rewards which his well directed labors claimed, and, while he lived in the greateſt popularity, he was carefully employed in obſerving the ſymptoms and the growth of every diſorder, and, from his judicious remarks, ſucceeding phyſicians have received the moſt valuable advantages. The experiments which he had tried upon the human frame increaſed his knowledge, and, from his conſummate obſervations, he knew how to moderate his own life as well as to preſcribe to others. He died in the 99th year of his age, B. C. 361, free from all diſorders of the mind and body; and, after death, he received the ſame honors which were paid to Hercules. His writings, few of which remain, have procured him the epithet of divine, and ſhow that he was the Homer of his profeſſion. According to Galen, his opinion is as reſpectable as the voice of an oracle. He wrote in the Ionic dialect, at the advice of Democritus, though he was a Dorian. His memory is ſtill venerated at Cos, and the preſent inhabitants of the iſland ſhew a ſmall houſe, which Hippocrates, as they mention, once inhabited. The beſt editions of his works are that of Fæſius, Genev. fol. 1657; of Linden, 2 vols, 8vo. Amſt. 1665; and that of Mackius, 2 vols. fol. Viennæ, 1743. His treatiſes, eſpecially the Aphoriſms, have been published separately. Plin. 7, c. 37.—Cic. de orat. 3.——An Athenian general in the Peloponnesian war. Plut.——A mathematician.——An officer of Chalcedon, killed by Alcibiades. Plut. in Alc.——A Syracusan defeated by Marcellus.——The father of Pisistratus.——A tyrant of Gela.

HIPPOCRATIA, a festival in honor of Neptune in Arcadia.

HIPPOCRĒNE, a fountain of Bœotia, near mount Helicon, sacred to the muses. It first rose from the ground, when struck by the feet of the horse Pegasus, whence the name ἵππου κρήνη, the horse's fountain. Ovid. 5, Met. v. 256.

HIPPŎDĂMAS, a son of the Achelous,—of Priam. Apollod.

HIPPŎDĂME & HIPPODAMIA, a daughter of Œnomaus, king of Pisa, in Elis, who married Pelops, son of Tantalus. Her father, who was either enamoured of her himself, or afraid lest he should perish by one of his daughter's children, according to an oracle, refused to marry her only to him who could overcome him in a chariot race. As the beauty of Hippodamia was greatly celebrated, many courted her, and accepted her father's conditions, though death attended a defeat. Thirteen had already been conquered, and laid down their lives, when Pelops came from Lydia. Pelops previously bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Œnomaus, and ensured himself the victory. In the race, Œnomaus mounted on a broken chariot, which the corrupted Myrtilus had purposely provided for him, was easily overcome, and was killed in the course; and Pelops married Hippodamia, and avenged the death of Œnomaus, by throwing into the sea the perfidious Myrtilus, who claimed for the reward of his treachery, the favor which Hippodamia could grant only to her husband. Hippodamia became mother of Atreus and Thyestes, and it is said that she died of grief for the death of her father, which her guilty correspondence with Pelops and Myrtilus had occasioned. Virg. G. 3, v. 7.—Hygin. fab. 84.—Paus. 5, c. 14, &c.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Heroid. 8 & 17.——A daughter of Adrastus, king of Argos. She married Pirithous, the king of the Lapithæ. The festivity which prevailed on the day of her marriage was interrupted by the attempts of Eurytus to offer her violence. [Vid. Pirithous.] Ovid. Met. 12.—Plut. in Thes.——A daughter of Danaus. Apollod.—A priestess of Achilles, daughter of Brises.——A daughter of Anchises, who married Alcathous. Homer. Il. 13.

HIPPŎDĂMUS, a man of Miletus, who settled a republic without any previous knowledge of government. Aristot. 2. Polit.

HIPPODRŎMUS, a son of Hercules. Id.——A Thessalian, who succeeded to a school at Athens, in the age of M. Antony. Philostr.——A place where horse races were exhibited. Martial 12, ep. 50.

HIPPŎLA, a town of Peloponnesus. Paus. 3, c. 25.

HIPPŎLŎCHUS, a son of Bellerophon, father to Glaucus. Homer. Il. 6.——A son of Antimachus slain in the Trojan war. Il. 11.

HIPPŎLŸTE, a queen of the Amazons, given in marriage to Theseus by Hercules, who had conquered her, and taken away her girdle by order of Eurystheus. [Vid. Hercules.] She had a son by Theseus, called Hippolytus. Plut. in Thes.—Propert. 4, el. 3.——The wife of Acastus, who fell in love with Peleus, who was in exile at her husband's court. She accused him of incontinence, and of attempts upon her virtue, before Acastus, only because he refused to gratify her desires. She is also called Astyochia. [Vid. Acastus.]——A daughter of Crethus. Apollod.

HIPPŎLŸTUS, a son of Theseus and Hippolyte, famous for his virtues and his misfortunes. His step-mother Phædra fell in love with him, and when he refused to pollute his father's bed, she accused him of offering violence to her person before Theseus. Her accusation was readily believed, and Theseus entreated Neptune severely to punish the incontinence of his son. Hippolytus fled from the resentment of his father, and, as he pursued his way along the sea shore, his horses were so frightened at the noise of sea-calves, which Neptune had purposely sent there, that they ran among the rocks till his chariot was broken and his body torn to pieces. Temples were raised to his memory, particularly at Trœzene, where he received divine honors. According to some accounts, Diana restored him to life. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 268. Met. 15, v. 469.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 761, &c.——A son of a king of Sicyon, greatly beloved by Apollo. Plut. in Num.——A giant, killed by Mercury.——A son of Ægyptus. Apollod. 1 & 2.——A Christian writer in the third century, whose works have been edited by Fabricius, Hamb. fol. 1716.

HIPPŎMĂCHUS, a musician, who severely rebuked one of his pupils, because he was praised by the multitude, and observed, that it was the greatest proof of his ignorance. Ælian. 2. V. H. c. 6.

HIPPŎMĔDON, a son of Nisimachus and Mythidice, who was one of the seven chiefs who went against Thebes. He was killed by Ismarus, son of Acastus. Apollod. 3, c. 6. Paus. 2, c. 36.

HIPPŎMĔNES, an Athenian archon, who exposed his daughter Limone to be devoured by horses, because guilty of adultery. Ovid. in Ib. 459.——A son of Macareus and Merope, rope, who married Atalanta, [Vid. Atalanta.] with the assistance of Venus. These two fond lovers were changed into lions by Cybele, whose temple they had profaned in their impatience to consummate their nuptials. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 585, &c.——The father of Megareus.

HIPPOMOLGI, a people of Scythia. Dionys. Perieg.

HIPPON & HIPPO, a town of Africa.

HIPPŌNA, a goddess, who presided over horses. Her statues were placed in horses' stables. Juv. 8, v. 157.

HIPPŌNAX, a Greek poet, born at Ephesus, 540 years before the Christian era. He cultivated the same satyrical poetry as Archilochus, and was not inferior to him in the beauty or vigor of his lines. His satyrical raillery obliged him to fly from Ephesus. As he was naturally deformed, two brothers, Buphalus and Anthermus, made a statue of him, which, by the deformity of its features, exposed the poet to universal ridicule. Hipponax resolved to revenge the injury, and he wrote such bitter invectives and satyrical lampoons against them that they hanged themselves in despair. Cic. ad famil. 7, ep. 24.

HIPPONIATES, a bay in the country of the Brutii.

HIPPŌNIUM, a city in the country of the Brutii, where Agathocles built a dock. Strab.

HIPPONOUS, the father of Peribœa and Capaneus. He was killed by the thunderbolts of Jupiter before the walls of Thebes. Apollod. 1, c. 8, l. 3, c. 1.——The first name of Bellerophon.——A son of Priam.

HIPPOPŌDES, a people of Scythia, who have horse's feet. Dionys. Perieg.

HIPPOSTRĂTUS, a favorite of Lais.

HIPPŌTĂDES, the patronymic of Æolus, grandson of Hippotas, by Segesta, as also of Amastrus, his son, who was killed in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 674. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 431.

HIPPOTAS or HIPPOTES, a Trojan prince, changed into a river. Vid. Crinisus.

HIPPOTHOE, a daughter of Nestor and Lysidice, carried away to the islands called Echinades by Neptune, by whom she had a son named Taphius. Apollod. 2, c. 4.——One of the Nereides. Id. 1, c. 2.——A daughter of Pelias. Id.

HIPPŌTHOON, a son of Neptune and Alope, daughter of Cercyon, exposed in the woods by his mother, that her amours with the god might be concealed from her father. Her shame was discovered, and her father ordered her to be put to death. Neptune changed her into a fountain, and the child was preserved by mares, whence his name. Hygin. fab. 187. —Paus. 1, c. 38.

HIPPOTHOONTIS, one of the 12 Athenian tribes, which received its name from Hippothoon.

HIPPŌTHOUS, a son of Lethus, killed by Ajax in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 4 & 17.——A son of Priam. Apollod. 3, c. 12.——A son of Ægyptus. Id.——One of the hunters of the Calydonian boar. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 307.

HIPPŌTION, a prince who assisted the Trojans, and was killed by Merion. Homer. Il. 13 & 14.

HIPPŪRIS, one of the Cyclades. Mela, 2, c. 7.

HIPPUS, a river falling into the Phasis.

HIPSIDES, a Macedonian, &c. Curt. 7, c. 7.

HIRA, a maritime town of Peloponnesus. Homer. Il. 12.

HIRPINI, a people of the Samnites.

Q. HIRPINUS, a Roman, to whom Horace dedicated his 2. od. 11. and also 1. ep. 16.

HIRTUS, a debauched fellow, &c. Juv. 10. v. 222.

HIRTIA LEX de magistratibus, by A. Hirtius. It required that none of Pompey's adherents should be raised to any office or dignity in the state.

HIRTIUS AULUS, a consul with Pansa, who assisted Brutus when besieged at Mutina by Antony. They defeated Antony, but were both killed in battle. Suet. in Aug. 10. ——An historian, to whom the 8th book of Cæsar's history of the Gallic wars, as also that of the Alexandrian and Spanish wars, is attributed. The stile is inferior to that of Cæsar's Commentaries. The author who was Cæsar's friend, and Cicero's pupil, is supposed to be no other than the consul of that name.

HISBON, a Rutulian, killed by Pallas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 384.

HISPĂNIA or HISPANIÆ, a large country of Europe, separated from Gaul by the Pyrenean mountains, and bounded on every other side by the sea, long subject to the power of Carthage. The Romans became sole masters of it at the end of the second Punic war, and divided at first into citerior and ulterior, which last was afterwards separated into Bætica and Lusitania, by Augustus. The Hispania citerior was also called Tarraconensis. The inhabitants were naturally warlike, and they often destroyed a life which was become useless, and even burdensome, by its infirmities. Spain was famous for its rich mines of silver, which employed 40,000 workmen, and daily yielded to the Romans no less than 20,000 drachms. It gave birth to Quintilian, Lucan, Seneca, &c. Justin. 44.—Strab. 3.—Mela. 2, c. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 1 & 20.

HISPELLUM, a town of Umbria.

HISPO, a noted debauchee, &c. Juv. 2, v. 50.

HISPULLA, a lascivious woman. Juv. 6, v. 72.

HISTASPES, a relation of Darius III. killed in a battle, &c. Curt. 4, c. 4.

HISTER

HISTER PACUVIUS, a man diſtinguiſhed as much by his vices as his immenſe riches. Juv. 2, v. 58.

HISTIÆA, a city of Eubœa, anciently called Talantia. It was near the promontory called Ceneum.

HISTIÆA, a city of Eubœa. Hom. Il. 2.

HISTIÆOTIS, a country of Theſſaly, ſituate below mount Olympus and mount Oſſa, anciently called Doris, from Dorus the ſon of Deucalion, and inhabited by the Pelaſgi. The Pelaſgi were driven from the country by the Cadmeans, and theſe laſt were alſo diſpoſſeſſed by the Perrhæbeans, who gave to their newly acquired poſſeſſions the name of Hiſtiæotis, or Eſtiæotis, from Eſtiæa, or Hiſtiæa, a town of Eubœa, which they had then lately deſtroyed, and whoſe inhabitants they had carried to Theſſaly with them. Strab.—Herodot. 4.——A ſmall country of Eubœa, of which Hiſtiæa, or Eſtiæa, was the capital.

HISTIÆUS, a tyrant of Miletus, who excited the Greeks to take up arms againſt Perſia. Herodot. 5, &c.——An hiſtorian of Miletus.

HISTRIA. Vid. Iſtria.

HODIUS, a herald in the Trojan war.

HOLŎCRON, a mountain of Macedon.

HŎMĒRUS, a celebrated Greek poet, the moſt ancient of all the profane writers. The age in which he lived is not known, though ſome ſuppoſe it to be about 168 years after the Trojan war, or, according to others, 160 years before the foundation of Rome. According to Paterculus, he floriſhed 968 years before the Chriſtian era, or 884, according to Herodotus, who ſuppoſes him to be cotemporary with Heſiod. The Arundelian Marbles fix his era 907 years before Chriſt, and make him alſo cotemporary with Heſiod. This diverſity of opinions proves the antiquity of Homer; and the uncertainty prevails alſo concerning the place of his nativity; no leſs than ſeven illuſtrious cities diſputed the right of having given birth to the greateſt of poets, as it is well expreſſed in theſe lines:

Smyrna, Chios, Colophon, Salamis, Rhodos, Argos, Athenæ, Orbis de patriâ certat, Homere, tuâ.

He was called Meleſigenes, becauſe ſuppoſed to be born on the borders of the river Meles. There prevailed a report that he had eſtabliſhed a ſchool at Chios in the latter part of his life; and, indeed, this opinion is favored by the preſent inhabitants of the iſland, who ſtill glory in ſhowing to travellers the ſeats where the venerable maſter and his pupils ſat in the hollow of a rock, at the diſtance of about four miles from the modern capital of the iſland. Theſe difficulties and doubts have not been removed, though Ariſtotle, Herodotus, Plutarch, and others, have employed their pen in writing his life. In his two celebrated poems called the Iliad and Odyſſey, Homer has diſplayed the moſt conſummate knowledge of human nature, and rendered himſelf immortal by the ſublimity, the fire, ſweetneſs, and elegance of his poetry. He deſerves a greater ſhare of admiration when we conſider that he wrote without a model, and that none of his poetical imitators have been able to ſurpaſs, or, perhaps, to equal their great maſter. If there are any faults found in his poetry, they are to be attributed to the age in which he lived, and not to him; and we muſt obſerve, that the world is indebted to Homer for his happy ſucceſſor Virgil. In his Iliad, Homer has deſcribed the reſentment of Achilles, and its fatal conſequences in the Grecian army before the walls of Troy. In the Odyſſey, the poet has for his ſubject the return of Ulyſſes into his country, with the many misfortunes which attended his voyage after the fall of Troy. Theſe two poems are each divided into 24 books, the ſame number as the letters of the Greek alphabet, and, though the Iliad claims an unconteſted ſuperiority over the Odyſſey, yet the ſame force, the ſame ſublimity and elegance, prevail, though diveſted of its more powerful fire; and Longinus, the moſt refined of critics, compares the Iliad to the mid-day, and the Odyſſey to the ſetting ſun, and obſerves, that the latter ſtill preſerves its original ſplendor and majeſty, though deprived of its meridian heat. The poetry of Homer was ſo univerſally admired that, in ancient times, every man of learning could repeat with facility any paſſage in the Iliad or Odyſſey; and, indeed, it was a ſufficient authority to ſettle diſputed boundaries, or to ſupport any argument. The poems of Homer are the compoſitions of a man who travelled and examined with the moſt critical accuracy whatever deſerved notice and claimed attention. Modern travellers are aſtoniſhed to ſee the different ſcenes which the pen of Homer deſcribed about 3000 years ago, ſtill exiſting in the ſame unvaried form, and the ſailor who ſteers his courſe along the Ægean, ſees all the promontories and rocks which appeared to Neſtor and Menelaus, when they returned victorious from the Trojan war. The ancients had ſuch veneration for Homer, that they not only raiſed temples and altars to him, but offered ſacrifices, and worſhipped him as a god. The inhabitants of Chios celebrated feſtivals every fifth year in his honor, and medals were ſtruck, which repreſented him ſitting on a throne, holding his Iliad and Odyſſey. The inhabitants of Cos, one of the Sporades, boaſted that Homer was buried in their iſland; and the Cyprians claimed the ſame ſame honor, and ſaid that he was born of Themiſto, a female native of Cyprus. Alexander was ſo fond of Homer, that he generally placed his compoſitions under his pillow, with his ſword; and he carefully depoſited the Iliad in one of the richeſt and moſt valuable caſkets of Darius, obſerving, that the moſt perfect work of human genius ought to be preſerved in a box the moſt valuable and precious in the world. It is ſaid, that Piſiſtratus, tyrant of Athens, was the firſt who collected and arranged the Iliad and Odyſſey in the manner in which they now appear to us, and that it is to the well directed purſuits of Lycurgus that we are indebted for their preſervation. Many of the ancients have written the life of Homer, yet their enquiries and labors have not much contributed to prove the native place, the parentage, and connections, of a man whom ſome have repreſented as deprived of ſight. Beſides the Iliad and Odyſſey, Homer wrote, according to the opinion of ſome authors, a poem upon Amphiarus' expedition againſt Thebes, beſides the Phoceis, the Cercopes, the ſmall Iliad, the Epicichlides, and the Batrachomyomachia, and many hymns to ſome of the gods. The merit of originality is taken very improperly, perhaps, from Homer, by thoſe who ſuppoſe, with Clemens Alex. 6 Strom. that he borrowed from Orpheus, or that, according to Suidas, [voce Corinnus] he took his plan of the Iliad from Corinnus, an epic poet, who wrote on the Trojan war, at the very time the Greeks beſieged that famed city. Agathon, an ancient painter, according to Ælian, repreſented the merit of the poet in a manner as bold as it is indelicate. Homer was repreſented as vomiting, and all other poets as ſwallowing what he ejected. Of the numerous commentaries publiſhed on Homer, that of Euſtathius, biſhop of Theſſalonica, is by far the moſt extenſive and erudite. The beſt editions of Homer's Iliad and Odyſſey may, perhaps, be found to be Barnes, 2 vols. 4to. Cantab. 1711; that of Glaſgow, 2 vols. fol. 1758; that of Berglerus, 2 vols. 12mo. Amſt. 1707; that of Dr. Clarke, of the Iliad, 2 vols, 4to. 1729, and of the Odyſſey, 1740; and that of Oxford, 5 vols, 8vo. 1780, containing the ſcholia, hymns, and an index. Herodot. 2. c. 53.—Theocrit. 16.—*Ariſtot. Homŏle, a lofty mountain of Theſſaly. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 675.

Homŏlea, a mountain of Magneſia.

Homolippus, a ſon of Hercules and Xanthis. Apollod.

Homoloides, one of the ſeven gates of Thebes. Stat. Theb. 7, v. 252.

Homonadenses, a people of Cilicia.

Honōrius, an emperor of the weſtern empire of Rome, who ſucceeded his father Theodoſius the Great, with his brother Arcadius. He was neither bold nor vicious, but he was of a modeſt and timid diſpoſition, unfit for enterpriſe, and fearful of danger. He conquered his enemies by means of his generals, and ſuffered himſelf and his people to be governed by miniſters who took advantage of their imperial maſter's indolence and inactivity. He died of a dropſy in the 39th year of his age, 15th of Auguſt, A. D. 423. He left no iſſue, though he married two wives. Under him and his brother the Roman power was divided into two different empires. The ſucceſſors of Honorius, who fixed their reſidence at Rome, were called the emperors of the weſt, and the ſucceſſors of Arcadius, who ſat on the throne of Conſtantinople, were diſtinguiſhed by the name of emperors of the eaſtern Roman empire. This diviſion of power proved fatal to both empires, and they ſoon looked upon one another with indifference, contempt, and jealouſy.

Hora, a goddeſs at Rome, ſuppoſed to be Herſilia, who married Romulus. She was ſuppoſed to preſide over beauty. Ovid. Met. 14, c. 851.

Horacitæ, a people near Illyricum.

Horapollo, a Greek writer, whoſe age is unknown. His Hieroglyphica, a curious and entertaining book, has been edited by Corn. de Pauw. 4to. Ultraj. 1727.

Horæ, three ſiſters, daughters of Jupiter and Themis, according to Heſiod, called Eunomia, Dice, and Irene. They were the ſame as the ſeaſons who preſided over the ſpring, ſummer, and winter, and were repreſented by the poets as opening the gates of heaven and of Olympus. Homer. Il. 5.—Pauſ. 5.—Heſiod. Theog.

Hŏrātius Cocles. Vid. Cocles.——Q. Flaccus, a celebrated poet, born at Venuſia. His father was a freed-man, and, though poor in his circumſtances, he liberally educated his ſon, and ſent him to learn philoſophy at Athens; after he had received the leſſons of the beſt maſters at Rome. Horace followed Brutus from Athens, and the timidity which he betrayed at the battle of Philippi ſo effectually diſcouraged him, that he for ever abandoned the profeſſion of arms, and, at his return to Rome, he applied himſelf to cultivate poetry. His riſing talents claimed the attention of Virgil and Varius, who recommended him to the care of Mecænas and Auguſtus, the moſt celebrated patrons of literature.

terature. Under the fostering patronage of the emperor and of his minister, Horace gave himself up to indolence and refined pleasure. He was a follower of Epicurus, and, while he liberally indulged his appetites, he neglected the calls of ambition, and never suffered himself to be carried away by the tide of popularity or public employments. He even refused to become the secretary of Augustus, and the emperor was not offended at his refusal. He lived at the tables of his illustrious patrons as if he were in his own house, and Augustus, while at his meals, sat with Virgil at his right hand, and Horace at his left, often ridiculed the short breath of the former, and the watery eyes of the latter, by observing that he sat between tears and sighs, Ego sum inter suspiria & lacrymas. Horace was warm in his friendship, and, if ever any ill-judged reflection had caused offence, the poet immediately made every concession which could effect a reconciliation, and not destroy the good purposes of friendly society. Horace died in the 57th year of his age, B. C. 8. His gaiety was suitable to the liveliness and dissipation of a court; and his familiar intimacy with Mecænas has induced some to believe that the death of Horace was violent, and that he hastened himself out of the world to accompany his friend. The 17th ode of his second book, which was written during the last illness of Mecænas, is too serious to be considered as a poetical rhapsody and effusion; and, indeed, the poet survived the patron only three weeks, and ordered his bones to be buried near those of his friend. He left all his possessions to Augustus. The poetry of Horace, so much commended for its elegance and sweetness, is deservedly censured for the licentious expressions and indelicate thoughts which he too frequently introduces. In his odes he has imitated Pindar and Anacreon; and, if he has confessed himself to be inferior to the former, he has shown that he bears the palm over the latter by his more ingenious and refined sentiments, by the ease and melody of his expressions, and by the pleasing variety of his numbers. In his satires and epistles, Horace displays much wit, and much satirical humor, without much poetry, and his style, simple and unadorned, differs little from prosaical composition. In his art of poetry he has shown much taste and judgment, and has rendered, in Latin hexameters, what Aristotle had, some ages before, delivered to his pupils in Greek prose. The poet gives judicious rules and useful precepts to the most powerful and opulent citizens of Rome, who, in the midst of peace and enjoyment, wished to cultivate poetry and court the muses. The best editions of Horace will be found to be that of Basil, fol. 1580, illustrated by eighty commentators; that of Baxter's, edited by Gesner, 8vo. Lips. 1752; and that of Glasgow, 12mo. 1744. Suet. in Aug. Ovid. Trist. 4. el. 10, v. 49.——Three brave Romans, born at the same birth, who fought against the three Curiatii, about 667 years before Christ. This celebrated fight was fought between the hostile camps of the people of Alba and Rome, and on their success depended the victory. In the first attack two of the Horatii were killed, and the only surviving one, by joining artifice to valor, obtained an honorable trophy: by pretending to fly from the field of battle, he easily separated his antagonists, and, in attacking them one by one, he was enabled to conquer them all. As he returned victorious to Rome, his sister reproached him with the murder of one of the Curiatii, to whom she was promised in marriage. He was incensed at the rebuke, and killed his sister. This violence raised the indignation of the people; he was tried and capitally condemned. His eminent services, however, pleaded in his favor; the sentence of death was exchanged for a more moderate but more ignominious punishment, and he was only compelled to pass under the yoke. A trophy was raised in the Roman forum, on which he suspended the spoils of the conquered Curiatii. Liv. 1. c. 24, &c.—Dionys. Hal. 3, c. 3.——A Roman consul, who defeated the Sabines.——A consul, who dedicated the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.

Hormisdas, a name which some of the Persian kings bore in the reign of the Roman emperors.

Horratus, a Macedonian soldier, who fought with another private soldier in sight of the whole army of Alexander. Curt. 9, c. 7.

Hortensia, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of the orator Hortensius, whose eloquence she had inherited in the most eminent degree. When the triumvirs had obliged 14,000 women to give, upon oath, an account of their possessions, to defray the expences of the state, Hortensia undertook to plead their cause, and was so successful in her attempt, that 1,000 of her female fellow-sufferers escaped from the avarice of the triumvirate. Val. Max. 8, c. 3.

Hortensia lex, by Q. Hortensius, the dictator, A. U. C. 867. It ordered the whole body of the Roman people to pay implicit obedience to whatever was enacted by the commons. The nobility, before this law was enacted, had claimed an absolute exemption.

Horta, or Hortinum, a town of the Sabines, on the confluence of the Par and the Tiber. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 716.

Q. Hor-

Q. Hortensius, a celebrated orator, who began to distinguish himself by his eloquence, in the Roman forum, at the age of nineteen. His friend and successor Cicero speaks with great eulogium of his oratorical powers, and mentions the uncommon extent of his memory. The affected actions of Hortensius at the bar procured him the ridiculous surname of Dionysia, a celebrated stage dancer at that time. He was prætor and consul, and died 50 years before Christ, in his 63d year. His orations are not extant. Quintilian mentions them as undeserving the great commendations which Cicero had so liberally bestowed upon them. Hortensius was very rich, and not less than 10,000 casks of Arvisian wine were found in his cellar after his death. He had written pieces of amorous poetry, and annals, all lost. Cic. in Brut. ad Attic. de Orat. &c.—Varro de R. R. 3, c. 5.——Corbio, a grandson of the orator of the same name, famous for his lasciviousness.——A rich Roman, who asked the elder Cato his wife, to procreate children. Cato gave his wife to his friend, and took her again after his death. This behaviour of Cato was highly censured at Rome, and it was observed, that Cato's wife had entered the house of Hortensius very poor, but that she returned to the bed of Cato in the greatest opulence. Plut. in Cat.——A Roman, slain by Antony on his brother's tomb. Id.——A prætor, who gave up Macedonia to Brutus. Id.——One of Sylla's lieutenants. Id.——A Roman, the first who introduced the eating of peacocks at Rome. This was at the feast he gave when he was created augur.

Hortōna, a town of Italy, on the confines of the Æqui. Liv. 3, c. 30.

Horus, a son of Isis, one of the deities of the Egyptians.——A king of Assyria.

Hostilia lex was enacted A. U. C. 583. By it such as were among the enemies of the republic, or absent when the state required their assistance, were guilty of rapine.

Hostilia, a large town on the Po. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 40.

Hostius Hostilius, a warlike Roman, presented with a crown of boughs by Romulus, for his intrepid behaviour in a battle. Dionys. Hal.——A consul.——A Latin poet, in the age of J. Cæsar.

Hyacinthia, an annual solemnity at Amyclæ, in Laconia, in honor of Hyacinthus and Apollo. It continued for three days, during which time the grief of the people was so great for the death of Hyacinthus, that they did not adorn their hair with garlands during their festivals, nor eat bread, but fed only upon sweetmeats. They did not even sing pæans in honor of Apollo, or observe any of the solemnities which were usual at other sacrifices. On the second day of the festival there were a number of different exhibitions. Youths, with their garments girt about them, entertained the spectators, by playing sometimes upon the flute, or upon the harp, and by singing anapestic songs, in loud echoing voices, in honor of Apollo. Others passed across the theatre mounted upon horses richly adorned, and, at the same time, choirs of young men came upon the stage singing their uncouth rustic songs, and accompanied by persons who danced at the sound of vocal and instrumental music, according to the ancient custom. Some virgins were also introduced in chariots of wood, covered at the top, and magnificently adorned. Others appeared in race chariots. The city began then to be filled with joy, and immense numbers of victims were offered on the altars of Apollo, and the votaries liberally entertained their friends and slaves. During this latter part of the festivity, all were eager to be present at the games, and the city was almost desolate, and without inhabitants. Athen. 4.

Hyacinthus, a son of Amyclas and Diomede, greatly beloved by Apollo and Zephyrus. He returned the former's love, and Zephyrus, incensed at his coldness and indifference, resolved to punish his rival. As Apollo, who was entrusted with the education of Hyacinthus, once played at quoit with his pupil, Zephyrus blew the quoit, as soon as it was thrown by Apollo, upon the head of Hyacinthus, and he was killed with the blow. Apollo was so disconsolate at the death of Hyacinthus, that he changed his blood into a flower, which bore his name, and placed his body among the constellations.——The Spartans also established yearly festivals in honor of the nephew of their king. [Vid. Hyacinthia.] Paus. 3, c. 19.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 185, &c.—Apollod. 3 &c.

Hyades, five daughters of Atlas, king of Mauritania, who were so disconsolate at the death of their brother Hyas, who had been killed by a wild boar, that they pined away and died. They became stars after death, and were placed near Taurus, one of the 12 signs of the Zodiac. They received the name of Hyades, from their brother Hyas. Their names are Phaola, Ambrosia, Eodora, Coronis, and Polyxo. To these some have added Thione and Prodice, and they maintained, that they were daughters of Hyas and Æthra, one of the Oceanides. Euripides calls them daughters of Erechtheus. The ancients supposed that the rising and setting of the Hyades was always attended with much rain. *Ovid. Hydra, a celebrated monſter, which infeſted the neighbourhood of the lake Lerna, in Peloponneſus. It was the fruit of Echidna's union with Typhon. It had an hundred heads, according to Diodorus; fifty, according to Simonides; and nine, according to the more received opinion of Apollodorus, Hyginus, &c. As ſoon as one of theſe heads was cut off, two immediately grew up if the wound was not ſtopped by fire. It was one of the labors of Hercules to deſtroy this dreadful monſter, and this he eaſily effected with the aſſiſtance of Iolaus, who applied a burning iron to the wounds as ſoon as one head was cut off. While Hercules was deſtroying the hydra, Juno, jealous of his glory, ſent a ſea-crab to bite his foot. This new enemy was ſoon diſpatched, and Juno, unable to ſucceed in her attempts to leſſen the fame of Hercules, placed the crab among the conſtellations, where it is now called the Cancer. The conqueror dipped his arrows in the gall of the hydra, and, from that circumſtance, all the wounds which he gave proved incurable and mortal. *Heſiod. Hyettus, a town of Bœotia. Pauſ. 9, c. 24.

Hygeia, the goddeſs of health, daughter of Æſculapius, held in great veneration among the ancients. Her ſtatues repreſented her with a veil, and the matrons uſually conſecrated their locks to her. She was alſo repreſented on monuments, like a young woman holding a ſerpent in one hand, and in the other a cup, out of which the ſerpent ſometimes drank. According to ſome authors, Hygeia is the ſame as Minerva, who received that name from Pericles, who erected her a ſtatue, becauſe in a dream ſhe had told him the means of curing an architect, whoſe aſſiſtance he wanted to build a temple. Plut. in Pericl.—Pauſ. 1, c. 23.

Hygiana, a town of Peloponneſus.

C. Jul. Hyginus, a grammarian, one of the freed men of Auguſtus. He was a native of Alexandria; or, according to ſome, he was a Spaniard, very intimate with Ovid. He was appointed librarian to the library of mount Palatine, and he was able to maintain himſelf by the liberality of C. Licinius. He wrote a mythological hiſtory, which he called fables, and Poeticon Aſtronomicon, beſides treatiſes on the cities of Italy, on ſuch Roman families as were deſcended from the Trojans, a book on agriculture, commentaries on Virgil, the lives of great men, &c. now loſt. The beſt edition of Hyginus is that of Munkerus, 2 vols. 8vo. Amſt. 1681. Theſe compoſitions have been greatly mutilated, and their incorrectneſs and their bad Latinity, have HYLA & HYLAS, a river of Myſia, where Hylas was drowned. Virg. G. 3, v. 6.——A colony of Phocis.

HYLACTOR, one of Actæon's dogs.

HYLÆUS, a name given to ſome centaurs, killed at the nuptials of Pirithous. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 294.

HYLAS, a ſon of Thiodamus, king of Myſia and Menodice, ſtolen away by Hercules, and carried on board the ſhip Argo to Colchis. On the Aſiatic coaſt the Argonauts landed to take a ſupply of freſh water, and Hylas, following the example of his companions, went to the fountain with a pitcher, and fell into the water and was drowned. The poets have embelliſhed this tragical ſtory, by ſaying, that the nymphs of the river, enamoured of the beautiful Hylas, carried him away; and that Hercules, diſconſolate at the loſs of his favorite youth, filled the woods and mountains with his complaints, and, at laſt, abandoned the Argonautic expedition to go and ſeek him. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Hygin. fab. 14, 271.—*Virg. HYLIAS, a river of Magna Græcia.

HYLLAICUS, a part of Peloponneſus, near Meſſenia.

HYLLUS, a ſon of Hercules and Dejanira, who, ſoon after his father's death, married Iole. He, as well as his father, was perſecuted by the envy of Euryſtheus, and obliged to fly from the Peloponneſus. The Athenians gave a kind reception to Hyllus and the reſt of the Heraclidæ, and marched againſt Euryſtheus. Hyllus obtained a victory over his enemies, and killed with his own hand Euryſtheus, and ſent his head to Alcmena, his grandmother. Some time after, he attempted to recover the Peloponneſus with the Heraclidæ, and was killed, in ſingle combat, by Echemus, king of Arcadia. HYLOPHAGI, a people of Æthiopia. Diod. 3.

HYMENÆUS & HYMEN, the god of marriage among the Greeks, was ſon of Bacchus and Venus, or, according to others, of Apollo and one of the muſes. Hymenæus, according to the more received opinions, was a young Athenian of extraordinary beauty, but ignoble origin. He became enamoured of the daughter of one of the richeſt and nobleſt of his countrymen, and, as the rank and elevation of his miſtreſs removed him from her preſence and converſation, he contented himſelf to follow her wherever ſhe went. In a certain proceſſion, in which all the matrons of Athens went to Eleuſis, Hymenæus, to accompany his miſtreſs, diſguiſed himſelf in woman's cloaths, and joined the religious troop. His youth, and the fairneſs of his features, favored his diſguiſe. A great part of the proceſſion was ſeized by the ſudden arrival of ſome pirates, and Hymenæus, who ſhared the captivity of his miſtreſs, encouraged his female companions, and aſſaſſinated their raviſhers while they were aſleep. Immediately after this, Hymenæus repaired to Athens, and promiſed to reſtore to liberty the matrons who had been enſlaved, provided he was allowed to marry one among them who was the object of his paſſion. The Athenians conſented, and Hymenæus experienced ſo much felicity in his marriage ſtate, that the people of Athens inſtituted feſtivals in his honor, and ſolemnly invoked him at their nuptials, as the Latins had their Thalaſſius. Hymen was generally repreſented as crowned with flowers, chiefly with marjoram or roſes, and holding a burning torch in one hand, and in the other a veſt of a purple color. It was ſuppoſed that he always attended at nuptials; for, if not, matrimonial connections were fatal, and ended in the moſt dreadful calamities; and hence people ran about, calling aloud, Hymen! Hymen! &c. Ovid. Medea. Met. 12, v. 215.—Virg. Æn. 1, &c.—Catull. ep. 62.

HYMETTUS, a mountain of Attica, about 22 miles in circumference, and about two miles from Athens, ſtill famous for its bees and excellent honey. There was alſo a quarry of marble there. Jupiter had there a temple; whence he is called Hymettius. Strab. 9.—Ital. 14, v. 200.

HYPÆTHA, a town of Theſſaly.

HYPÆNOR, a Trojan, killed by Diomedes at Troy. Homer. Il. 5.

HYPERBIUS, a ſon of Ægyptus. Apollod.

HYPERBOREI, a nation in the northern parts of Europe and Aſia. The word ſignifies people who inhabit beyond the wind Boreas. Thrace was the reſidence of Boreas, according to the ancients. Whenever the Hyperboreans made offerings they always ſent them towards the ſouth, and the people of Dodona were the firſt of the Greeks who received them. The word Hyperboreans is applied, in general, to all thoſe who inhabit any cold climate. Virg. G. 3, v. 169.—Herodot. 4, c. 13, &c.

HYPEREA & HYPERIA, a fountain of Theſſaly, with a town of the ſame name. Strab. 9.——Another in Meſſenia, in Peloponneſus. Flacc. 1, v. 375.

HYPEREIA, a town of Achaia. Strab. 8.

HYPERIDES, an Athenian orator, diſciple to Plato and Socrates, and long the rival of Demoſthenes. His father's name was Glaucippus. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his eloquence, and the active part he took in the management of the Athenian republic. After the unfortunate battle of Cranon, he was taken alive, and, that he might not be compelled to betray the ſecrets of his country, he cut off his tongue. He was put to death by order of Antipater, B. C. 322. Only one of his numerous orations remains, admired for the ſweetneſs and elegance of his ſtile. It is ſaid, that Hyperides once defended the courtezan Phryne, who was accuſed of impiety, and that, when he ſaw his eloquence ineffectual, he unveiled the boſom of his client, upon which the judges, influenced by the ſight of her beauty, acquitted her. Plut. in Demoſt. —Cic. in Orat. 1, &c.—Quintil. 10, &c.

HYPERION, a ſon of Cœlus and Terra, who married Thea, by whom he had Aurora, the ſun and moon. Hyperion is often taken by the poets for the ſun itſelf. Heſiod. Theog. Apollod. 1, c. 1 & 2. Homer. hymn ad Ap.——A ſon of Priam. Apollod. 1, c. 2.

HYPERMNESTRA, one of the fifty daughters of Danaus, who married Lynceus, ſon of Ægyptus. She diſobeyed her father's bloody commands, who had ordered her to murder her huſband the firſt night of her nuptials, and ſuffered Lynceus to eſcape unhurt from the bridal bed. Her father ſummoned her to appear before juſtice for her diſobedience, but the people acquitted her, and Danaus was reconciled to her and her huſband, to whom he left his kingdom at his death. Some ſay, that Lynceus returned to Argos with an army, and that he conquered and put to death his father-in law, and uſurped his crown. Vid. Danaides. Pauſ. 2, c. 19.—Apollod. 2, c. 1. —*Ovid. HYPSA, a river of Sicily. Ital. 14, v. 258.

HYPSÆA, a Roman matron, of the family of the Plautii. She was blind, according to Horace; or, perhaps, was partial to ſome lover, who was recommended neither by perſonal nor mental excellence. Hora. 1. ſat. 2, v. 91.

HYPSÆNOR, a prieſt of the Scamander, killed during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 5.

HYPSEUS, a ſon of the river Peneus.

HYPSICRATEA, the wife of Mithridates, who accompanied her huſband in man's cloaths, when he fled before Pompey. Plut. in Pomp.

HYPSICRATES, a Phœnician, who wrote an hiſtory of his country, in the Phœnician language. This hiſtory was ſaved from the flames of Carthage, when that city was taken by Scipio, and tranſlated into Greek.

HYPSIPYLE, a queen of Lemnos, daughter of Thoas. During her reign, Venus, whoſe altars had been univerſally ſlighted, puniſhed the Lemnian women, and rendered their mouths and breath ſo extremely offenſive to the ſmell, that their huſbands abandoned them and gave themſelves up to ſome female ſlaves, whom they had taken in a war againſt Thrace. This contempt was highly reſented by all the women of Lemnos, and they reſolved on revenge, and all unanimouſly put to death their male relations, Hypſipyle alone excepted, who ſpared the life of her father Thoas. Soon after this cruel murder, the Argonauts landed at Lemnos, in their expedition to Colchis, and remained for ſome time in the iſland. During their ſtay the Argonauts rendered the Lemnian women mothers, and Jaſon, the chief of the Argonautic expedition, left Hypſipyle pregnant at his departure, and promiſed her eternal fidelity. Hypſipyle brought twins, Euneus and Nebrophonus, whom ſome have called Deiphilus or Thoas. Jaſon forgot his vows and promiſes to Hypſipyle, and the unfortunate queen was ſoon after forced to leave her kingdom by the Lemnian women, who conſpired againſt her life, ſtill mindful that Thoas had been preſerved by means of his daughter. Hypſipyle, in her flight, was ſeized by pirates, and ſold to Lycurgus, king of Nemæa. She was entruſted with the care of Archemorus, the ſon of Lycurgus; and, when the Argives marched againſt Thebes, they met Hypſipyle, and obliged her to ſhow them a fountain, where they might quench their thirſt. To do this more expeditiouſly, ſhe laid down the child on the graſs, and, in her abſence, he was killed killed by a serpent. Lycurgus attempted to revenge the death of his son, but Hypsipyle was screened from his resentment by Adrastus, the leader of the Argives. *Ovid. HYRCĀNIA, a large country of Asia, at the north of Parthia, and at the west of Media, abounding in serpents, wild beasts, &c. It is very mountainous, and unfit for drawing a cavalry in order of battle. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 367.—Strab. 2 & 11.——A town of Asia, destroyed by a violent earthquake in the age of Tiberius.

HYRCĀNUM MARE, a large sea. Vid. Caspium mare.

HYRCĀNUS, a name common to some of the high priests of Judæa. Josephus.

HYRIA, a country of Bœotia, near Aulis, with a lake, river, and town of the same name. It is more probably situate near Tempe. It received its name from Hyrie, a woman, who wept so much for the loss of her son, that she was changed into a fountain. Ovid. Met. 7.—Herodot. 7, c. 170.——A town of Isauria, on the Calycadnus.

HYRIEUS & HYREUS, a peasant, or, as some say, a prince of Tanagra, who kindly entertained Jupiter, Neptune, and Mercury, when travelling over Bœotia. Being childless, he asked of the gods to give him a son without his marrying, as he promised his wife, who was lately dead, and whom he tenderly loved, that he never would marry again. The gods, to reward the hospitality of Hyreus, made water in the hide of a bull, which had been sacrificed the day before to their divinity, and they ordered him to wrap it up and bury it in the ground for nine months. At the expiration of the nine months, Hyreus opened the earth, and found a beautiful child in the bull's hide, whom he called Orion. Vid. Orion.

HYRMINA, a town of Elis, in Peloponnesus. Strab. 8.

HYRNETO & HYRNETHO, a daughter of Temenus, king of Argos, who married Deyphon, son of Celeus. She was the favorite of her father, who greatly enriched her husband. Apollod. 2, c. 6.—Paus. 2, c. 19.

HYSSUS & HYSSI, a port and river of Cappadocia on the Euxine sea.

HYSTASPES, a noble Persian, of the family of the Achæmenides. His father's name was Arsames. His son Darius reigned in Persia after the murder of the usurper Smerdis. It is said, by Ctesias, that he wished to be carried to see the royal monument which his son had built between two mountains. The priests who carried him, as reported, slipped the cord with which he was suspended in ascending the mountain, and he died of the fall. Hystaspes was the first who introduced the learning and mysteries of the Indian Brachmans into Persia, and to his researches in India the sciences were greatly indebted, particularly in Persia. Darius is called Hystaspes, or son of Hystaspes, to distinguish him from his royal successors of the same name. Herodot. 1, c. 209, l. 5, c. 83.——Ctesias Frag.

IAMĬDÆ, certain prophets among the Greeks, deſcended from Iamus, a ſon of Apollo, who received the gift of prophecy from his father, which remained among his poſterity. Pauſ. 6, c. 2.

IANĪCŬLUM & Ianicularius mons, one of the ſeven hills at Rome, joined to the city by Ancus Martius, and made a kind of citadel, to protect the place againſt an invaſion. This hill, which was on the oppoſite ſhore of the Tiber, was joined to the city by the bridge Sublicius, the firſt ever built acroſs that river, and perhaps in Italy. It was leſs inhabited than the other parts of the city, on account of the groſſneſs of the air, though, from its top, the eye could have a commanding view of the whole city. It is famous for the burial of king Numa and the poet Italicus. Porſenna, king of Etruria, pitched his camp on mount Ianiculum, and the ſenators took refuge there in the civil wars, to avoid the reſentment of Octavius. Liv. 1, c. 33, &c.—Dio. 47.—Ovid. 1, Faſt. v. 246.—Virg. 8, v. 358.—Mart. 4, ep. 64, l. 7, ep. 16.

IANTHEA, one of the Oceanides.—One of the Nereides. Pauſ. 4, c. 30.—Homer. Il. 8.

JĀNUS, the moſt ancient king who reigned in Italy. He was a native of Theſſaly, and ſon of Apollo, according to ſome. He came to Italy, where he planted a colony and built a ſmall town on the river Tiber, which he called Janiculum. Some authors make him ſon of Cœlus and Hecate; and others make him a native of Athens. During his reign, Saturn, driven from heaven by his ſon Jupiter, came to Italy, where Janus received him with much hoſpitality, and made him his colleague on the throne. Janus is repreſented with two faces, becauſe he was acquainted with the paſt and the future; or, according to others, becauſe he was taken for the ſun who opens the day at his riſing, and ſhuts it at his ſetting. Some ſtatues repreſented Janus with four heads. He ſometimes appeared with a beard, and ſometimes without. In religious ceremonies, his name was always invoked the firſt, becauſe he preſides over all gates and avenues, and it is through him only that prayers can reach the immortal gods. From that circumſtance, he often appears with a key in his right hand, and a rod in his left. Sometimes he holds the number 300 in one hand, and in the other 65, to ſhew that he preſides over the year, of which the firſt month bears his name. Some ſuppoſe that he is the ſame as the world, or Cœlus; and, from that circumſtance, they call him Eanus, ab eundo, becauſe of the revolution of the heavens. He was called by different names, ſuch as Conſivius a Conſerendo, becauſe he preſided over generation; Quirinus or Martialis, becauſe he preſided over war. He is alſo called Patulcius & Clauſius, becauſe the gates of his temples were opened during the time of war, and ſhut in time of peace. He was chiefly worſhipped among the Romans, where he had many temples, ſome erected to Janus Bifrons, others to Janus Quadrifrons. The temples of Quadrifrons were built with four equal ſides, with a door and three windows on each ſide. The four doors were the emblems of the four ſeaſons of the year, and the three windows in each of the ſides the three months of each ſeaſon, and, all together, the twelve months of the year. Janus was generally repreſented in ſtatues as a young man. After death, Janus was ranked among the gods, for his popularity, and the civilization which he had introduced among the wild inhabitants of Italy. His temple, which was always open in times of war, was ſhut only three times during above 700 years, under Numa, 234 B.C. and under Auguſtus, and during that long period of time, the Romans were continually employed in war. Ovid. Faſt. 1, v. 65, &c.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 607.—Varro de L. L. 1.—Macrob. Sat. 1 ——A ſtreet at Rome, near the temple of Janus. It was generally frequented by uſurers.

JAPĔTUS, a ſon of Cœlus or Titan, by Terra, who married Aſia, or, according to others, Clymene, by whom he had Atlas, Menœtius, Prometheus, and Epimetheus. The Greeks looked upon him as the father of all mankind. His ſons received the patronymic of Iapetionides. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 631. Heſiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.

IĀPŸGIA, a country on the confines of Italy in the form of the peninſula, between Tarentum and Brunduſium. It is called by ſome Meſſapia, Peucetia, and Salentinum. Plin. 3, c. 11.—Strab. 6.

IĀPYX, a ſon of Dædalus, who conquered a part of Italy, which he called Iapyg a. Ovid.

Ovid. Met. 14, v. 458.——A wind which blows from Apulia, and is favorable to ſuch as ſailed from Italy towards Greece. It was nearly the ſame as the Caurus of the Greeks. Horat. 1, od. 3. v. 4.

IARBAS, a ſon of Jupiter and Garamantis, king of Gætulia, from whom Dido bought land to build Carthage. He courted Dido, but the rival of Æneas prevented his ſucceſs, and the queen, rather than marry Iarbas, deſtroyed herſelf. Vid. Dido. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 36, &c.—Juſtin. 18, c. 6.—Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 552.

IÂRCHAS, & JARCHAS, a celebrated Indian philoſopher. His ſeven rings are famous; they could reſtore old men to the bloom and vigor of youth, according to the traditions of Philoſtr. in Apoll.

IARDĂNUS, a Lydian, father of Omphale, the miſtreſs of Hercules. Herodot. 1, c. 7. ——A river of Arcadia. —— Another in Crete. Homer. Il. 7.

IASIDES, a patronymic given to Palinurus as deſcended from a perſon of the name of Jaſius. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 843.—alſo of Jaſus. Id. 12, v. 392.

IASION & IASIUS, a ſon of Jupiter and Electra, one of the Atlantides, who reigned over part of Arcadia, where he diligently applied himſelf to agriculture. He married the goddeſs Cybele or Ceres, and all the gods were preſent at the celebration of his nuptials. He had by Ceres two ſons, Philomelus and Plutus, to whom ſome have added a third, Corybas, who introduced the worſhip and myſteries of his mother in Phrygia. He had alſo a daughter whom he expoſed as ſoon as born, ſaying that he would raiſe only male children. The child who was ſuckled by a ſhe-bear and preſerved rendered herſelf famous afterwards under the name of Atalanta. Jaſion was killed with a thunderbolt of Jupiter, and ranked among the gods after death by the inhabitants of Arcadia. Heſiod. Theog.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 168.—Hygin. Poet. 2, c. 4.

IASIUS, a ſon of Abas, king of Argos. ——A ſon of Jupiter. Vid. Iaſion.

JĂSON, a celebrated hero, ſon of Alcimedes, daughter of Phylacus by Æſon the ſon of Cretheus, by Tyro the daughter of Salmoneus. Tyro, before her connection with Cretheus the ſon of Æolus, had two ſons, Pelias and Neleus by Neptune. Æſon was king of Iolchos, and at his death the throne was uſurped by Pelias, on account of the tender youth of Jaſon, the lawful ſucceſſor. The education of young Jaſon was entruſted to the care of the Centaur Chiron, and he was removed from the preſence of the uſurper who had been informed by an oracle that one of the deſcendants of Æolus would dethrone him. After he had made the moſt rapid progreſs in every branch of ſcience, Jaſon left the Centaur, and by his advice went to conſult the oracle. He was ordered to go to Iolchos his native country covered with the ſpoils of a leopard, and dreſſed in the garments of a Magneſian. In his journey he was ſtopped by the inundation of the river Evenus or Enipeus, over which he was carried by Juno, who had changed herſelf into an old woman. In croſſing the ſtreams, he loſt one of his ſandals, and at his arrival at Iolchos, the ſingularity of his dreſs, and the fairneſs of his complexion attracted the notice of the people, and drew a crowd around him in the market place. Pelias came to ſee him with the reſt, and as he had been warned by the oracle to beware of a man who ſhould appear at Iolchos with one foot bare, and the other ſhod, the appearance of Jaſon, who had loſt one of his ſandals alarmed him. His terrors were ſoon after augmented, Jaſon, accompanied by his friends, repaired to the palace of Pelias, and boldly demanded the kingdom which he had unjuſtly uſurped. The boldneſs and popularity of Jaſon intimidated Pelias, he was unwilling to abdicate the crown, and yet he feared the reſentment of his adverſary. As Jaſon was young and ambitious of glory, Pelias, at once, to remove his immediate claims to the crown, reminded him that Æetes king of Colchis had ſeverely treated, and inhumanly murdered their common relation Phryxus. He obſerved that ſuch a treatment called aloud for puniſhment, and that the undertaking would be accompanied with much glory and fame. He farther added that his old age had prevented him from avenging the death of Phryxus, and that if Jaſon would undertake the expedition, he would reſign to him the crown of Iolchos when he returned victorious from Colchis. Jaſon readily accepted a propoſal which ſeemed to promiſe ſuch military fame. His intended expedition was made known in every part of Greece, and the youngeſt and braveſt of the Greeks aſſembled to accompany him, and ſhare his toils and glory. They embarked on board a ſhip called Argo, and after a ſeries of adventures they arrived at Colchis. (Vid. Argonautæ.) Æetes promiſed to reſtore the golden fleece, which was the cauſe of the death of Phryxus, and of the voyage of the Argonauts, provided they ſubmitted to his conditions. Jaſon was to tame bulls who breathed flames, and who had the feet and horns of braſs, and to plough with them a field ſacred to Mars. After this he was to ſow in the ground the teeth of a ſerpent from which armed men would ariſe, whoſe fury would be converted againſt him who ploughed the field. He was alſo to kill a monſtrous dragon who watched night and day at the foot of the tree, on which the golden fleece was ſuſpended. All were concerned for the fate of the Argonauts, but Juno, who watched with an anxious eye over the ſafety of Jaſon, extricated them from all theſe difficulties. Medea, the king's daughter, fell in love with Jaſon, and as her knowledge of herbs, enchantments and incantation was uncommon, ſhe pledged herſelf to deliver her lover from all his dangers if he promiſed her eternal fidelity. Jaſon, not inſenſible to her charms and to her promiſes, vowed eternal fidelity in the temple of Hecate, and received from Medea whatever inſtruments and herbs could protect him againſt the approaching dangers. He appeared in the field of Mars, he tamed the fury of the oxen, ploughed the plain, and ſowed the dragon's teeth. Immediately an army of men ſprang from the field, and ran towards Jaſon. He threw a ſtone among them, and they fell on upon the other till all were totally deſtroyed The vigilance of the dragon was lulled to ſleep by the power of herbs, and Jaſon took from the tree the celebrated golden fleece, which was the ſole object of his voyage These actions were all performed in the preſence of Æetes and his people, who were all equally aſtoniſhed at the boldneſs and ſucceſs of Jaſon. After this celebrated conqueſt, Jaſon immediately ſet ſail for Europe with Medea, who had been ſo inſtrumental in his preſervation. Upon this Æeter, deſirous to revenge the perfidy of his daughter Medea, ſent his ſon Abſyrtus to purſue the fugitives. Medea killed her brother, and ſtrewed his limbs in her father's way, that ſhe might more eaſily eſcape, while he was employed in collecting the mangled members of his ſon. (Vid. Abſyrtus) The return of the Argonauts in Theſſaly was celebrated with univerſal feſtivity, but Æſon, Jaſon's father, was unable to attend on account of the infirmities of old age. This obſtruction was removed, and Medea, at the requeſt of her huſband, reſtored Æſon to the vigor and ſprightlineſs of youth. (Vid Æſon.) Pelias the uſurper of the crown of Iolchos, wiſhed alſo to ſee himſelf reſtored to the flower of youth, and his daughters, perſuaded by Medea, who wiſhed to avenge her huſband's wrongs, cut his body to pieces, and placed his limbs in a cauldron of boiling water. Their credulity was ſeverely puniſhed. Medea ſuffered the fleſh to be conſumed to the bones, and Pelias was never reſtored to life. This inhuman action drew the reſentment of the populace upon Medea, and ſhe fled to Corinth with her huſband Jaſon, where they lived in perfect union and love during ten ſucceſſive years. Jaſon's partiality for Glauce, the daughter of the king of the country, afterwards diſturbed their matrimonial happineſs, and Medea was divorced that Jaſon might more freely indulge his amorous propenſities. This infidelity was ſeverely revenged by Medea, (Vid. Glauce.) who deſtroyed her children in the preſence of their father. (Vid. Medea.) After his ſeparation from Medea, Jaſon lived an unſettled and melancholy life. As he was one day reposing himſelf by the ſide of the ſhip which had carried him to Colchis, a beam fell upon his head, and he was cruſhed to death. This tragical event had been predicted to him before by Medea, according to the relation of ſome authors. Some ſay that he afterwards returned to Colchis, where he ſeized the kingdom, and reigned in great ſecurity. *Eurip. in Med. —Ovid. Icăria, a small island in the Ægean sea, near Samos, Strab. 10 & 14.

Icărium mare, a part of the Ægean sea near the islands of Mycone and Gyaros. Vid. Icarus.

Icărius, an Athenian, father of Erigone. He gave wine to some peasants who drank it with the greatest avidity, ignorant of its intoxicating nature. They were soon deprived of their reason and the fury and resentment of their friends and neighbours were immediately turned upon Icarius, who perished by their hands. After death he was honored with public festivals, and his daughter was led to discover the place of his burial by means of his faithful dog Mœra. Erigone hung herself in despair, and was changed into a constellation called Virgo, Icarius was changed into the star Bootes, and the dog Mœra into the star Canis, Hygin. fab. 130—Apollod. 3, c. 14.——A son of Œbalus of Lacedæmon. He gave his daughter Penelope in marriage to Ulysses king of Ithaca, but he was so tenderly attached to her, that he wished her husband to settle at Lacedæmon. Ulysses refused, and when he saw the earnest petitions of Icarius, he told Penelope as they were going to embark, that she might choose freely, either to follow him to Ithaca, or to remain with her father. Penelope blushed in the deepest silence, and covered her head with her veil. Icarius upon this permitted his daughter to go to Ithaca, and immediately erected a temple to the goddess of modesty, on the spot where Penelope had covered her blushes with her veil. Homer. Od.

Icărus, a son of Dædalus, who, with his father, fled with wings from Crete to escape the resentment of Minos. His flight being too high proved fatal to him, and the sun melted the wax which cemented his wings, and he fell into that part of the Ægean sea which was called after his name. Idas, a ſon of Aphareus and Arane, famous for his valor and military glory. He was among the Argonauts, and married Marpeſſa the daughter of Evenus king of Ætolia. Marpeſſa was carried away by Apollo, and Idas purſued his wife's raviſher with bows and arrows, and obliged him to reſtore her. [Vid. Marpeſſa.] According to Apollodorus, Idas with his brother Lynceus aſſociated with Pollux and Caſtor to carry away ſome flocks; but when they had obtained a ſufficient quantity of plunder, they refuſed to divide it into equal ſhares. This provoked the ſons of Leda, Lynceus was killed by Caſtor, and Idas, to revenge his brother's death, immediately killed Caſtor, and in his turn periſhed by the hand of Pollux. According to Ovid and Pauſanias, the quarrel between the ſons of Leda and thoſe of Aphareus aroſe from a more tender cauſe: Idas and Lynceus, as they ſay, were going to celebrate their nuptials with Phœbe and Hilaira the two daughters of Leucippus; but Caſtor and Pollux who had been invited to partake the common feſtivity, offered violence to the brides, and carried them away. Idŏmĕneus, ſucceeded his father Deucalion on the throne of Crete, and accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, with a fleet of 90 ſhips. During this celebrated war he rendered himſelf famous by his valor, and ſlaughtered many of the enemy. At his return he made a vow to Neptune in a dangerous tempeſt, that if he eſcaped from the fury of the ſeas and ſtorms, he would offer to the god whatever living creature firſt preſented itſelf to his eye on the Cretan ſhore. This was no other than his ſon, who came to congratulate his father upon his ſafe return. Idomeneus performed his promiſe to the god, and the inhumanity and raſhneſs of this ſacrifice rendered him ſo odious in the eyes of his ſubjects, that he left Crete, and migrated in queſt of a ſettlement. He came to Italy and founded a city on the coaſt of Calabria, which he called Salentum. He died in an extreme old age, after he had had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing his new kingdom floriſh, and his ſubjects happy. According to the Greek ſcholiaſt of Lycophron, v. 1217, Idomeneus, during his abſence in the Trojan war, entruſted the management of his kingdom to Leucos, to whom he promiſed his daughter Cliſithere in marriage at his return. Leucos at firſt governed with moderation; but he was perſuaded by Nauplius, king of Eubœa, to put to death Meda the wife of his maſter, with her daughter Cliſithere, and to ſeize the kingdom. After theſe violent meaſures, he ſtrengthened himſelf on the throne of Crete; and Idomeneus, at his return, found it impoſſible to expel the uſurper. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 358.—Hygin. 92.—*Homer. Ilecaones & Ilecaonenses, a people of Spain. Liv. 22, c. 21.

Ilerda, a town of Spain. Lucan. 4, v. 13.

Ilia or Rhea, a daughter of Numitor, king of Alba, conſecrated by her uncle Amulius, to the ſervice of Veſta, which required perpetual chaſtity, that ſhe might not become a mother to diſpoſſeſs him of his crown. He was however diſappointed; violence was offered to Ilia, and ſhe brought forth Romulus and Remus, who drove the uſurper from his throne, and reſtored the crown to their grand father Numitor, its lawful poſſeſſor. Ilia was buried alive by Amulius, for violating the laws of Veſta; and becauſe her tomb was near the Tiber, ſome ſuppoſe that ſhe married the god of that river. Horat. 1, od. 2.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 277.—Ovid. Faſt. 2, v. 598.——A wife of Sylla.

Iliăci ludi, games inſtituted by Auguſtus, in commemoration of the victory he had obtained over Antony and Cleopatra. They are ſuppoſed to be the ſame as the Trojani ludi and the Actia; and Virgil ſays, they were celebrated by Æneas, not only becauſe they were inſtituted at the time when he wrote his poem, but becauſe he wiſhed to compliment Auguſtus, by making the founder of Lavinium ſolemnize games on the very ſpot which was, many centuries after, to be ſacred by the trophies of his patron. During theſe games, were exhibited horſe races, and gymnaſtic exerciſes. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 280.

Iliăcus, an epithet applied to ſuch as belong to Troy. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 101.

Iliădes, a ſirname given to Romulus, as ſon of Ilia. Ovid.——A name given to the Trojan women. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 484.

Ilias, a celebrated poem compoſed by Homer, upon the Trojan war. It delineates the wrath of Achilles, and all the calamities which fell upon the Greeks, from the refuſal of that hero to appear in the field of battle. It finiſhes at the death of Hector, whom Achilles had ſacrificed to the ſhades of his friend Patroclus. It is divided into 24 books. Vid. Homerus.——A ſirname of Minerva.

Ilion. Vid. Ilium.

Iliŏne, the eldeſt daughter of Priam, who married Polymneſtor, king of Thrace. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 657.

Iliŏneus, a Trojan, ſon of Phorbas. He came into Italy with Æneas. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 525.——A ſon of Artabanus, made priſoner by Parmenio, near Damaſcus. Curt. 3, c. 13.——One of Niobe's ſons. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 6.

Ilissus, a ſmall river of Attica, falling into the ſea, near the Piræus. There was a temple on its banks, ſacred to the Muſes. Stat. Theb. 4, v. 52.

Ilĭthyia, a goddeſs, called alſo Juno Lucina. Some ſuppoſe her to be the ſame as Diana. She preſided over the travails of women; and in her temple, at Rome, it was uſual to carry a ſmall piece of money as an offering. This cuſtom was firſt eſtabliſhed by Servius Tullius, who, by enforcing it, was enabled to know the exact number of the Roman people. Heſiod.—Homer. Il. 11, Od. 19.—Apollod. 1 & 2.—Horat. carm. ſæcul.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 283.

Ilium or Ilion, a citadel of Troy, built by Ilus, one of the Trojan kings, from whom it received its name. It is generally taken for Troy itſelf; and ſome have ſuppoſed that the town was called Ilium, and the adjacent country Troja. (Vid. Troja.) Virg. Æn. 1, &c.—Strab. 13.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 505.—Horat. 3, od. 3.—Juſtin. 11, c. 5. l. 31, c. 8.

Illiberis, a town of Gaul, through which Hannibal paſſed, as he marched into Italy.

Illipŭla, two towns of Spain, one of which is called Major, and the other Minor.

Illiturgis, Iliturgis, or Ilirgia, a city of Spain on the river Bætis, deſtroyed by Scipio, for having revolted to the Carthaginians. Liv. 24, c. 49.

Illўrĭcum, Illўris, & Illўria, a country bordering on the Adriatic ſea, oppoſite Italy, whoſe boundaries have been different at different times. It became a Roman province, after Gentius its king had been conquered by the prætor Anicius; and it now forms part of Croatia, Boſnia, and Sclavonia. Strab. 2 & 7.—Pauſ. 4, c. 35. Mela. 2, c. 2. &c.—Flor. 1, 2. &c.

Illўrĭcus sinus, that part of the Adriatic, which is on the coaſt of Illyricum.

Illўrius, a ſon of Cadmus and Hermione, from whom Illyricum received its name. Apollod.

Ilua, an iſland in the Tyrrhene ſea, celebrated for its iron mines. The people are called Iluates. Liv. 30, c. 39.—Virg. Æn. 10, v. 173.

Ilyrgis, a town of Hiſpania Bætica. Polyb.

Ilus, the 4th king of Troy, was ſon of Tros by Callirhoe. He married Eurydice the daughter of Adraſtus, by whom he had Themis, who married Capys, and Laomedon the father of Priam. He built, or rather embelliſhed, the city of Ilium, called alſo Troy, from his father Tros. Jupiter gave him the Palladium, a celebrated ſtatue of Minerva, and promiſed that as long as it remained in Troy, ſo long would the town remain impregnable. When the temple of Minerva was in flames, Ilus ruſhed into the middle of the fire to ſave the Palladium, for which action he was deprived of his ſight by the goddeſs; though he recovered it ſome time after. Homer. Il.—Strab. 13.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 33. l. 6, v. 419.——A name of Aſcanius, while he was at Troy. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 272.——A friend of Turnus, killed by Pallas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 400.

Imanuentius, a king of part of Britain, killed by Caſſivelaunus, &c. Cæſ. bell. G. 5.

Imaus, a large mountain of Scythia, which is part of mount Taurus. It divides Scythia, which is generally called Intra Imaum, and Extra Imaum. It extends, according to ſome, as far as the boundaries of the eaſtern ocean. Plin. 5, &c.—Strab. 2.

Imbrăsus, a part of mount Taurus, in Armenia.

Imbrăcĭdes, a patronymic given to Aſius, as ſon of Imbracus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 123.

Imbrăsĭdes, a patronymic given to Glaucus and Lades, as ſons of Imbraſus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 343.

Imbrăsus, or Parthenius, a river of Samos. Juno, who was worſhipped on the banks, received the ſirname of Imbraſia. Pauſ. 7, c. 4.——The father of Pirus, the leader of the Thracians during the Trojan war. Virg. Æn. 10 & 12.—Homer. Il. 4.

Imbreus, one of the Centaurs, killed by Dryas, at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 310.

Imbrius, a Trojan killed by Teucer, ſon of Mentor. He had married Medeſicaſte, Priam's daughter. Homer. Il. 13.

Imbrivium, a place of Samnium.

Imbros, an iſland of the Ægean ſea, near Thrace, 32 miles from Samothrace, with a ſmall river and town of the ſame name. Imbros was governed for ſome time by its own laws, but afterwards ſubjected to the power of Perſia, Athens, Macedonia, and the kings of Pergamus. It afterwards became a Roman province. Thucyd. 8.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Homer. Il. 13.—Strab. 2.—Mela. 2, c. 7.

Inăchi, a name given to the Greeks, particularly the Argives, from king Inachus.

Inachia, a name given to Peloponneſus, from the river Inachus.——A feſtival in Crete, in honor of Inachus; or, according to others, of Ino's misfortunes.——A courtezan in the age of Horace. Epod. 12.

Inăchidæ, the name of the eight firſt ſucceſſors of Inachus, on the throne of Argos.

Inăchides, a patronymic of Epaphus, as grandſon of Inachus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 704.——And of Perſeus, deſcended from Inachus. Id. 4, fab. 11.

Inăchium, a town of Peloponneſus.

Inăchus, a ſon of Oceanus and Tethys, who founded the kingdom of Argos, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Phoroneus, B. C. 1807, and gave his name to a river of Argos, of which he became the tutelar deity. He reigned 60 years. Apollod. 2, c. 3.—Pauſ.——A river of Argos.——Another in Epirus.

Inamămes, a river in the eaſt, as far as which Semiramis extended her empire. Polyæn. 8.

Inarime, an iſland near Campania, with a mountain, under which Jupiter confined the the giant Typhœus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 716.

INARUS, a town of Egypt, in whoſe neighbourhood the town of Naucratis was built, by the Mileſians.——A tyrant of Egypt, who died B. C. 456.

INCITATUS, a horſe of the emperor Caligula, made high prieſt.

INDATHYRSUS. Vid. Idanthyrſus.

INDIA, the moſt celebrated and opulent of all the countries of Aſia, bounded on one ſide by the Indus, from which it derives its name. It is ſituate at the ſouth of the kingdoms of Perſia, Parthia, &c. along the maritime coaſts. It has always been reckoned famous for the riches it contains; and ſo perſuaded were the antients of its wealth, that they ſuppoſed that its very ſands were gold. It contained 9000 different nations, and 5000 remarkable cities, according to geographers. Bacchus was the firſt who conquered it. In more recent ages, part of it was tributary to the power of Perſia. Alexander invaded it; but his conqueſt was checked by the valor of Porus, one of the kings of the country, and the Macedonian warrior was unwilling or afraid to engage another. Semiramis alſo extended her empire far in India. The Romans knew little of the country, yet their power was ſo univerſally dreaded, that the Indians paid homage by their ambaſſadors to the emperors Antoninus, Trajan, &c. India is divided into ſeveral provinces. There is an India extra Gangem, an India intra Gangem, and an India propria; but theſe diviſions are not particularly noticed by the antients. Died. 1.—Strab. 1, &c.—Mela. 3, c. 7.—Plin. 5, c. 28.—Curt. 8, c. 10.—Juſtin. 1, c. 2. l. 12, c. 7.

INDIGĔTES, a name given to thoſe deities who were worſhipped only in ſome particular places, or who were become gods from men, as Hercules, Bacchus, &c. Some derive the word from inde & geniti, born at the ſame place where they received their worſhip. Virg. G. 1, v. 498.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 608.

INDIGĔTI, a people of Spain.

INDUS, a large river of Aſia, from which the adjacent country has received the name of India. It falls into the Indian ocean by two mouths. According to Plato, it was larger than the Nile; and Pliny ſays, that 19 rivers diſcharge themſelves into it, before it falls into the ſea. Strab. 15.—Curt. 8, c. 9.—Died. 2.—Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 720.—Plin. 6, c. 20.

INO, a daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, who nurſed Bacchus. She married Athamas, king of Thebes, after he had divorced Nephele, by whom he had two children, Phryxus and Helle. Ino became mother of Melicerta and Learchus, and ſoon conceived an implacable hatred againſt the children of Nephele, becauſe they were to aſcend the throne in preference to her own. Phryxus and Helle, were informed of Ino's machinations, and they eſcaped to Colchis on a golden ram. (Vid. Phryxus.) Juno, jealous of Ino's proſperity, reſolved to diſturb her peace; and more particularly, becauſe ſhe was of the deſcendants of her greateſt enemy, Venus. Tiſiphone was ſent, by order of the goddeſs, to the houſe of Athamas; and ſhe filled the whole palace with ſuch fury, that Athamas, taking Ino to be a lioneſs, and her children whelps, purſued her and daſhed her ſon Learchus againſt a wall. Ino eſcaped from the fury of her huſband, and from a high rock ſhe threw herſelf into the ſea, with Melicerta in her arms. The gods pitied her fate, and Neptune made her a ſea deity, which was afterwards called Leucothoe. Melicerta became alſo a ſea god, known by the name of Palæmon. Homer. od. 5.—Cic. Tuſc. de Nat. D. 3, c. 48.—Plut. Symp. 5.—Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 13, &c.—Pauſ. 1, 2, &c.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Hygin. fab. 12, 14, & 15.

INŌA, feſtivals in memory of Ino, celebrated yearly with ſports and ſacrifices at Corinth. An anniverſary ſacrifice was alſo offered to Ino at Megara, where ſhe was firſt worſhipped, under the name of Leucothoe.——Another in Laconia, in honor of the ſame. It was uſual, at the celebration, to throw cakes of flour into a pond, which, if they ſunk, were preſages of proſperity; but if they ſwam on the ſurface of the waters, they were inauſpicious and very unlucky.

INOUS, a patronymic given to the god Palæmon, as ſon of Ino. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 823.

INŌRES, a river of Delos, which the inhabitants ſuppoſe to be the Nile, coming from Egypt under the ſea. It was near its banks that Apollo and Diana were born. Plin. 2, c. 103.—Flacc. 5, v. 105.—Strab. 6.—Pauſ. 2, c. 4.

INSŬBRES, the inhabitants of Inſubria, a country near the Po, ſuppoſed to be of Gallic origin. They were conquered by the Romans, and their country became a province. Strab. 5.

INTAPHERNES, one of the ſeven Perſian noblemen, who conſpired againſt Smerdis, who uſurped the crown of Perſia. He was ſo diſappointed for not obtaining the crown, that he fomented ſeditions againſt Darius who had been raiſed to the throne after the death of the uſurper. When the king had ordered him and all his family to be put to death, his wife, by frequently viſiting the palace, excited the compaſſion of Darius, who pardoned her, and permitted her to redeem from death any one of her relations relations whom ſhe pleaſed. She obtained her brother; and when the king expreſſed his aſtoniſhment, becauſe ſhe preferred him to her huſband and children, ſhe replied, that ſhe could procure another huſband, and children likewiſe; but that ſhe could never have another brother, as her father and mother were dead. Intaphernes was put to death. Herodot. 3.

INTERAMNA, an antient city of Umbria. Tacit. Hiſt. 2, c. 64.——A colony on the confines of Samnium.

INTERCATIA, a town of Spain.

INTERREX, a ſupreme magiſtrate at Rome, who was entruſted with the care of the government after the death of a king, till the election of another. This office was exerciſed by the ſenators alone, and one continued in power no longer than five days, or, according to Plutarch, only 12 hours. The firſt interrex mentioned in Roman hiſtory, is after the death of Romulus, when the Romans quarrelled with the Sabines concerning the choice of a king. There was ſometimes an interrex during the conſular government; but this happened only to hold aſſemblies in the abſence of the magiſtrates, or when the election of any of the acting officers was diſputed. Liv. 1, c. 17.—Dionyſ. 2.

INUI CASTRUM. Vid. Caſtrum Inui. It received its name from Inuus, a divinity ſuppoſed to be the ſame as the Faunus of the Latins, and worſhipped in this city.

INYCUS, a city of Sicily. Herodot.

Io, a daughter of Inachus, or, according to others, of Jaſus or Pirene, was prieſteſs of Juno at Argos. Jupiter became enamoured of her; but Juno, jealous of his intrigues, diſcovered the object of his affection, and ſurpriſed him in the company of Io. Jupiter changed his miſtreſs into a beautiful heifer; and the goddeſs, who well knew the fraud, obtained from her huſband the animal, whoſe beauty ſhe had condeſcended to commend. Juno commanded the hundred-eyed Argus to watch the heifer; but Jupiter, anxious for the ſituation of Io, ſent Mercury to deſtroy Argus, and to reſtore her to liberty. (Vid. Argus.) Io, freed from the vigilance of Argus, was now perſecuted by Juno; who ſent one of the furies, or rather a malicious inſect, to torment her. She wandered over the greateſt part of the earth, and croſſed over the ſea, till at laſt ſhe ſtopped on the banks of the Nile, ſtill expoſed to the unceaſing torments of Juno's inſect. Here ſhe intreated Jupiter to reſtore her to her ancient form; and when the god had changed her from a heifer into a woman, ſhe brought forth Epaphus. Afterwards ſhe married Telegonus king of Egypt or Oſiris, according to others, and ſhe treated her ſubjects with ſuch mildneſs and humanity, that, after death, ſhe received divine honors, and was worſhipped under the name of Iſis. According to Herodotus, Io was carried away by Phœnician merchants, who wiſhed to make repriſals for Europa, who had been ſtolen from them by the Greeks. Some ſuppoſe that Io never came to Egypt. She is ſometimes called Phoronis, from her brother Phoroneus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 748.—Paſ. 1, c. 25, l. 3, c. 18.——Moſchus.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 789.—Hygin. fab. 145.

IOBATES & JOBATES, a king of Lycia, father of Stenobœa, the wife of Prœtus, king of Argos. He was ſucceeded on the throne by Bellerophon, to whom he had given one of his daughters, called Philonoe, in marriage. (Vid. Bellerophon.) Apollod. 2, c. 2.—Hygin. fab. 57.

IOBES, a ſon of Hercules by a daughter of Theſpius. He died in his youth. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

JOCASTA, a daughter of Menœceus, who married Laius, king of Thebes, by whom ſhe had Œdipus. She afterwards married her ſon Œdipus, without knowing who he was, and had by him Eteocles, Polynices, &c. (Vid. Laius, Oedipus.) When ſhe diſcovered that ſhe had married her own ſon, and had been guilty of inceſt, ſhe hanged herſelf in deſpair. She is called Epicaſta by ſome mythologiſts. Stat. Theb. 8, v. 42.—Senec. & Sophocl. in Oedip.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Hygin. fab. 66. &c.—Homer. Od. 11.

IOLAIA, a feſtival at Thebes, the ſame as that called Heracleia. It was inſtituted in honor of Hercules and his friend Iolas, who aſſiſted him in conquering the hydra. It continued during ſeveral days, on the firſt of which were offered ſolemn ſacrifices. The next day horſe races and athletic exerciſes were exhibited. The following day was ſet apart for wreſtling; the victors were crowned with garlands of myrtle, generally uſed at funeral ſolemnities. They were ſometimes rewarded with tripods of braſs. The place where the exerciſes were exhibited was called Iolaion, where there was to be ſeen the monument of Amphitryon, and the cenotaph of Iolas, who was buried in Sardinia. Theſe monuments were ſtrewed with garlands and flowers on the day of the feſtival.

IOLAS or IOLAUS, a ſon of Iphiclus, king of Theſſaly, who aſſiſted Hercules in conquering the Hydra, and burnt with a hot iron the place where the heads had been cut off, to prevent the growth of others. He was reſtored to his youth and vigor by Hebe, at the requeſt of his friend Hercules. Some time afterwards, Iolas aſſiſted the Heraclidæ againſt Euryſtheus, and killed the tyrant tyrant with his own hand. According to Plutarch, Iolas had a monument in Bœotia and Phocis, where lovers uſed to go and bind themſelves by the moſt ſolemn oaths of fidelity, conſidering the place as ſacred to love and friendſhip. According to Diodorus and Pauſanias, Iolas died and was buried in Sardinia, where he had gone to make a ſettlement at the head of the ſons of Hercules by the fifty daughters of Theſpius. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 399.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Pauſ. 10, c. 17.——A compiler of a Phœnician hiſtory.——A friend of Æneas, killed by Catillus in the Rutulian wars. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 640.

Iolchos, a town of Magneſia, above Demetrias, where Jaſon was born. It was founded by Cretheus, ſon of Æolus and Enaretta. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Strab. 8.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Lucan. 3, v. 192.

Iole, a daughter of Eurytus, king of Œchalia. Her father promiſed her in marriage to Hercules, but he refuſed to perform his engagements, and Iole was carried away by force. (Vid. Eurytus.) It was to extinguiſh the love of Hercules for Iole, that Dejanira ſent him the poiſoned tunic, which cauſed his death. (Vid. Hercules & Dejanira.) After the death of Hercules, Iole married his ſon Hyllus, by Dejanira. Apollod. 2, c. 7. —Ovid. Met. 9, v. 279.

Ion, a ſon of Xuthus and Creuſa, daughter of Erechtheus, who married Helice, the daughter of Selinus, king of Ægiale. He ſucceeded on the throne of his father-in-law, and built a city, which he called Helice, on account of his wife. His ſubjects from him received the name of Ionians, and the country that of Ionia. (Vid. Iones & Ionia.) Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Pauſ. 7, c. 1.—Strab. 7.—Herodot. 7, c. 94, &c.——A tragic poet of Chios, whoſe tragedies, when repreſented at Athens, met with univerſal applauſe. He is mentioned and greatly commended by Ariſtophanes and Athenæus, &c. Athen. 10, &c.——A native of Epheſus, introduced in Plato's dialogues as reaſoning with Socrates.

Ione, one of the Nereides.

Iones, a name originally given to the ſubjects of Ion, who dwelt at Helice. In the age of Ion the Athenians made a war againſt the people of Eleuſis, and implored his aid againſt their enemies. Ion conquered the Eleuſinians and Eumolpus, who was at their head; and the Athenians, ſenſible of his ſervices, invited him to come and ſettle among them; and the more ſtrongly to ſhow their affection, they aſſumed the name of Ionians. Some ſuppoſe that, after this victory, Ion paſſed into Aſia Minor, at the head of a colony. When the Achæans were driven from Peloponneſus by the Heraclidæ, eighty years after the Trojan war, they came to ſettle among the Ionians, who were then maſters of Ægialus. They were ſoon diſpoſſeſſed of their territories by the Achæans, and went to Attica, where they met with a cordial reception. Their migration from Greece to Aſia Minor was about 60 years after the return of the Heraclidæ, B.C. 1044, and 80 years after the departure of the Æolians; and they therefore finally ſettled themſelves, after a wandering life of about 30 years.

Ionia, a country of Aſia Minor, bounded on the north by Æolia, on the weſt by the Ægean and Icarian ſea, on the ſouth by Caria, and on the eaſt by Lydia and part of Caria. It was founded by colonies from Greece, and particularly Attica, by the Ionians, or ſubjects of Ion. Ionia was divided into twelve ſmall ſtates, which formed a celebrated confederacy, often mentioned by the ancients. Theſe twelve ſtates were Priene, Miletus, Colophon, Clazomenæ, Epheſus, Lebedos, Teos, Phocæa, Erythræ, Smyrna, and the capitals of Samos and Chios. The inhabitants of Ionia built a temple, which they called Pan Ionium, from the concourſe of people that flocked there from every part of Ionia. After they had enjoyed for ſome time their freedom and independence, they were made tributary to the power of Lydia, by Crœſus. The Athenians aſſiſted them to ſhake off the ſlavery of the Aſiatic monarchs; but they ſoon forgot their duty and relation to their mother country, and joined Xerxes when he invaded Greece. They were delivered from the Perſian yoke by Alexander, and reſtored to their original independence. They were reduced by the Romans under the dictator Sylla. Ionia has been always celebrated for the ſalubrity of the climate, the fruitfulneſs of the ground, and the genius of its inhabitants. Herodot. 1, &c.—Strab. 14.—Mela. 1, c. 2, &c.—Pauſ. 7, c. 1.——An ancient name given to Hellas, or Achaia, becauſe it was for ſome time the reſidence of the Ionians.

Ionium mare, a part of the Mediterranean ſea, at the bottom of the Adriatic, lying between Sicily and Greece. That part of the Ægean ſea which lies on the coaſts of Ionia, in Aſia, is called the ſea of Ionia, and not the Ionian ſea. According to ſome authors, the Ionian ſea receives its name from Io, who ſwam acroſs there, after ſhe had been metamorphoſed into a heifer. Strab. 7, &c.—Dionyſ. Perieg.

Iopas, a king of Africa, among the ſuitors of Dido. He was an excellent muſician, poet, and philoſopher. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 744.

Iope & Joppa, a famous town of Phœnicia, oicia, more ancient than the deluge, according to ſome traditions. It was about forty miles from the capital of Judæa, and was remarkable for a ſea-port much frequented, though very dangerous, on account of the great rocks that lie before it. Strab. 16, &c.—Propert. 2, el. 28, v. 51.——A daughter of Iphicles, who married Theſeus. Plut.

Iŏphon, a ſon of Sophocles, who accuſed his father of imprudence in the management of his affairs, &c.——A poet of Gnoſſus, in Crete. Panſ. 1, c. 34.

Jordănes, a river of Judæa. Strab. 16.

Jornandes, an hiſtorian, who wrote on the Goths. He died A. D. 552.

Ios, an iſland in the Myrtoan Sea, celebrated, as ſome ſay, for the tomb of Homer, and the birth of his mother. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Joſephus Flavius, a celebrated Jew, born in Jeruſalem, who ſignalized his military abilities in ſupporting a ſiege of forty-ſeven days againſt Veſpaſian and Titus, in a ſmall town of Judæa. When the city ſurrendered there were found not leſs than 40,000 Jews ſlain, and the number of captives amounted to 1,200. Joſephus ſaved his life by flying into a cave, where 40 of his countrymen had alſo taken refuge. He diſſuaded them from committing ſuicide, and, when they had all drawn lots to kill one another, Joſephus fortunately remained the laſt, and ſurrendered himſelf to Veſpaſian. He gained the conqueror's eſteem, by foretelling that he would become one day the maſter of the Roman empire. Joſephus was preſent at the ſiege of Jeruſalem by Titus, and received all the ſacred books which it contained from the conqueror's hands. He came to Rome with Titus, where he was honored with the name and privileges of a Roman citizen. Here he made himſelf eſteemed by the emperors Veſpaſian and Titus, and dedicated his time to ſtudy. He wrote the hiſtory of the wars of the Jews, firſt in Syriac, and afterwards tranſlated it into Greek. This compoſition ſo pleaſed Titus, that he authenticated it by placing his ſignature upon it, and by preſerving it in one of the public libraries. He finiſhed another work, which he divided into 20 books, containing the hiſtory of the Jewiſh antiquities, in ſome places ſubverſive of the authority and miracles mentioned in the Scriptures. He alſo wrote two books to defend the Jews againſt Apion, their greateſt enemy; beſides an account of his own life, &c. Joſephus has been admired for his lively and animated ſtile, the bold propriety of his expreſſions, the exactneſs of his deſcriptions, and the perſuaſive eloquence of his orations. He has been called the Livy of the Greeks. Though, in ſome caſes, inimical to the Chriſtians, yet he has commended our Saviour ſo warmly, that St. Jerome calls him a Chriſtian writer. Joſephus died A. D. 93, in the 56th year of his age. The beſt editions of his works are Hudſon's, 2 vols. fol. Oxon 1720, and Havercamp's, 2 vols. fol. Amſt. 1726. Sueton. in Veſp. &c.

Jovĭanus Flavius Claudius, a native of Panonia, elected emperor of Rome by the ſoldiers after the death of Julian. He at firſt refuſed to be inveſted with the imperial purple, becauſe his ſubjects followed the religious principles of the late emperor; but they removed his groundleſs apprehenſions, and, when they aſſured him that they were warm for Chriſtianity, he accepted the crown. He made a diſadvantageous treaty with the Perſians, againſt whom Julian was marching with a victorious army. Jovian died ſeven months and twenty days after his aſcenſion, and was found in his bed ſuffocated by the vapors of charcoal, which had been lighted in his room, A. D. 364. Some attribute his death to intemperance, and ſay that he was the ſon of a baker. He burned a celebrated library at Antioch. Marcellin.

Iphianassa, a daughter of Prœtus, king of Argos, who, with her ſiſters Iphinoe and Lyſippe, ridiculed Juno, &c. Vid. Proetides.——The wife of Endymion.

Iphĭclus, or Iphicles, a ſon of Amphitryon and Alcmena, born at the ſame birth with Hercules. As theſe two children were together in the cradle, Juno, jealous of Hercules, ſent two large ſerpents to deſtroy him. At the ſight of the ſerpents Iphicles alarmed the houſe, but Hercules, though not a year old, boldly ſeized them, one in each hand, and ſqueezed them to death. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Theocrit.——A king of Phylace, in Phthiotis, ſon of Philacus and Clymene. He had bulls famous for their bigneſs, and the monſter which kept them. Melampus, at the requeſt of his brother, [Vid. Melampus.] attempted to ſteal them away, but he was caught in the fact, and impriſoned. Iphiclus ſoon received ſome advantages from the prophetical knowledge of his priſoner, and not only reſtored him to liberty, but alſo preſented him with the oxen. Iphiclus, who was childleſs, learned from the ſoothſayer how to become a father. He had married Automeduſa, and afterwards a daughter of Creon, king of Thebes. He was father to Podarce and Proteſilaus. Homer. Od. 11. Il. 13.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Panſ. 4, c. 36.——A ſon of Theſtius, king of Pleuron. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

Iphicrătes, a celebrated general of Athens, who, tho' ſon of a ſhoemaker, roſe from the loweſt ſtation to the higheſt offices in the ſtate. He made war againſt the Thracians, Thracians, obtained ſome victories over the Spartans, and aſſiſted the Perſian king againſt Egypt. He changed the dreſs and arms of his ſoldiers, and rendered them more alert and expeditious in uſing their weapons. He married a daughter of Cotys, king of Thrace, and died 380 B. C. When he was once reproached of the meanneſs of his origin, he obſerved, that he would be the firſt of his family, but that his detractor would be the laſt of his own. C. Nep. in Iphic.——A ſculptor of Athens.——An Athenian, ſent to Darius the Third, king of Perſia, &c. Curt. 3, c. 13.

Iphidamus, a ſon of Antenor, killed by Agamemnon. Homer. Il. 11.

Iphidemia, a Theſſalian woman, raviſhed by the Naxians, &c.

Iphigenia, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemneſtra. When the Greeks, going to the Trojan war, were detained by contrary winds at Aulis, they were informed by one of the ſoothſayers, that, to appeaſe the gods, they muſt ſacrifice Iphigenia, Agamemnon's daughter, to Diana. [Vid. Agamemnon.] The father, who had provoked the goddeſs by killing her favorite ſtag, heard this with the greateſt horror and indignation, and rather than to ſhed the blood of his daughter, he commanded one of his heralds, as chief of the Grecian forces, to order all the aſſembly to depart each to his reſpective home. Ulyſſes and the other generals interfered, and Agamemnon conſented to immolate his daughter for the common cauſe of Greece. As Iphigenia was tenderly loved by her mother, the Greeks ſent for her on pretence of giving her in marriage to Achilles. Clytemneſtra gladly permitted her departure, and Iphigenia came to Aulis: here ſhe ſaw the bloody preparations for the ſacrifice; ſhe implored the forgiveneſs and protection of her father, but tears and entreaties were unavailing. Calchas took the knife in his hand, and, as he was going to ſtrike the fatal blow, Iphigenia ſuddenly diſappeared, and a goat of uncommon ſize and beauty was found in her place for the ſacrifice. This ſupernatural change animated the Greeks, the wind ſuddenly became favorable, and the combined fleet ſet ſail from Aulis. Iphigenia's innocence had raiſed the compaſſion of the goddeſs on whoſe altar ſhe was going to be ſacrificed, and ſhe carried her to Taurica, where ſhe entruſted her with the care of her temple. In this ſacred office Iphigenia was obliged, by the command of Diana, to ſacrifice all the ſtrangers which came into that country. Many had already been offered as victims on the bloody altar, when Oreſtes and Pylades came to Taurica. Their mutual and unparalleled friendſhip [Vid. Pylades & Oreſtes] diſcloſed to Iphigenia that one of the ſtrangers whom ſhe was going to ſacrifice was her brother; and, upon this, ſhe conſpired with the two friends to fly from the barbarous country, and carry away the ſtatue of the goddeſs. They ſucceſsfully effected their enterpriſe, and murdered Thoas, who enforced the human ſacrifices. According to ſome authors, the Iphigenia who was ſacrificed at Aulis was not a daughter of Agamemnon, but a daughter of Helen, by Theſeus. Homer does not ſpeak of the ſacrifice of Iphigenia, though very minute in the deſcription of the Grecian forces, adventures, &c. Pauſ. 2, c. 22, l. 3, c. 16.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 31.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 116. Æſchyl.—Euripid.

Iphimedia, a daughter of Triopas, who married the giant Alœus. She fled from her huſband, and had two ſons, Otus and Ephialtes, by Neptune, her father's father. Homer. Od. 11.—Pauſ. 9, c. 22.—Apollod. 1, c. 7.

Iphimedon, a ſon of Euryſtheus, killed in a war againſt the Athenians and Heraclidæ. Apollod.

Iphimedusa, one of the daughters of Danaus, who married Euchenor. Vid. Danaides.

Iphinoe, one of the principal women of Lemnos, who conſpired to deſtroy all the males of the iſland after their return from a Thracian expedition. Flacc. 2, v. 163.—— One of the daughters of Prœtus. She died of a diſeaſe while under the care of Melampus. Vid. Prœtides.

Iphis, ſon of Alector, ſucceeded his father on the throne of Argos. He adviſed Polynices, who wiſhed to engage Amphiaraus in the Theban war, to bribe his wife Eriphyle, by giving her the golden collar of Harmonia. This ſucceeded, and Eriphyle betrayed her huſband. Apollod. 3.—Flacc. 1, 3, & 7.——A beautiful youth of Salamis, of ignoble birth. He became enamoured of Anaxarete, and the coldneſs and contempt he met with rendered him ſo deſperate that he hung himſelf. Anaxarete ſaw him carried to his grave without emotion, and was inſtantly changed into a ſtone. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 703.——A daughter of Theſpius. Apollod.——A miſtreſs of Patroclus, given him by Achilles. Homer. Il. 9.——A daughter of Ligdus and Telethuſa, of Crete. When Telethuſa was pregnant, Ligdus ordered her to deſtroy her child if it proved a daughter, becauſe his poverty could not afford to maintain an uſeleſs charge. The ſevere orders of her huſband alarmed Telethuſa, and ſhe would have obeyed, had not Iſis commanded her in a dream to ſpare the life of her child. Telethuſa brought forth a daughter, which was given to a nurſe, and passed for a boy, under the name of Iphis. Ligdus continued ignorant of the deceit, and, when Iphis was come to the years of puberty, her father resolved to give her in marriage to Ianthe, the beautiful daughter of Telestes. A day to celebrate the nuptials was appointed, but Telethusa and her daughter were equally anxious to put off the marriage, and, when all was unavailing, they implored the assistance of Isis, by whose advice the life of Iphis had been preserved. The goddess was moved, she changed the sex of Iphis, and, on the morrow, the nuptials were consummated with the greatest rejoicings. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 666, &c.

Iphition, an ally of the Trojans, killed by Achilles. Homer. Il. 20.

Iphitus, a son of Eurytus, king of Œchalia. When his father had promised his daughter Iole to him who could overcome him or his sons in drawing the bow, Hercules accepted the challenge, and came off victorious. Eurytus refused his daughter to the conqueror, observing, that Hercules had killed one of his wives in a fury, and that Iole might perhaps share the same fate. Some time after, Autolycus stole away the oxen of Eurytus, and Hercules was suspected of the theft. Iphitus was sent in quest of the oxen, and, in his search, he met with Hercules, whose good favors he had gained by advising Eurytus to give Iole to the conqueror. Hercules assisted Iphitus in seeking the lost animals; but, when he recollected the ingratitude of Eurytus, he killed Iphitus by throwing him down from the walls of Tyrinthus. Homer. Od. 21.—Apollod. 2, c. 6.——A Trojan, who survived the ruin of his country, and fled with Æneas to Italy. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 340, &c.——A king of Elis, son of Praxonides, in the age of Lycurgus. He re-established the Olympic games 338 years after their institution by Hercules, or about 884 years before the Christian era. This epoch is famous in chronological history, as every thing previous to it seems involved in fabulous obscurity. Paterc. 1, c. 8.—Paus. 5, c. 4.

Iphthime, a sister of Penelope, who married Eumelus. She appeared to her sister in a dream, to comfort her in the absence of her son Telemachus. Hom. Od. 4.

Ipsia, the mother of Medea. Ovid. Heroid. 17, v. 232.

Ipsus, a place of Phrygia, celebrated for a battle which was fought there about 301 years before the Christian era, between Antigonus and his son, and Seleucus, Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Cassander. The former led into the field an army of above 70,000 foot and 10,000 horse, with 75 elephants. The latter's forces consisted of 64,000 infantry, besides 10,500 horse, 400 elephants, and 120 armed chariots. Antigonus and his son were defeated. Plut. in Demetr.

Ira, a city of Messenia, which Agamemnon promised to Achilles, if he would resume his arms to fight against the Trojans. This place is famous in history as having supported a siege of eleven years against the Lacedæmonians, and with its capture, B.C. 671, put an end to the second Messenian war. Hom. Il. 9.—Strab. 7.

Irene, a daughter of Cratinus the painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.—One of the seasons among the Greeks, called by the moderns Horæ. Her two sisters were Dia and Eunomia, all daughters of Jupiter and Themis. Apollod. 1, c. 3.

Irenæus, a native of Greece, disciple of Polycarp, and bishop of Lyons in France. He wrote on different subjects, but, as what remains is in Latin, some suppose he composed in that language, and not in Greek. Fragments of his works in Greek are however preserved, which prove that his stile was simple, though clear and often animated. His opinions concerning the soul are curious. He suffered martyrdom A.D. 202. The best edition of his works is that of Grabe, Oxon. fol. 1702.

Iresus, a delightful spot in Libya, near Cyrene, where Battus fixed his residence. The Egyptians were once beaten there by the inhabitants of Cyrene. Herodot. 4, c. 158, &c.

Iris, a daughter of Thaumas and Electra, one of the Oceanides, messenger of the gods, and more particularly of Juno. Her office was to cut the thread which seemed to detain the soul in the body of those that were expiring. She is the same as the rainbow, and, from that circumstance, she is represented with all the variegated and beautiful colors of the rainbow, and appears sitting behind Juno ready to execute her commands. She is likewise described as supplying the clouds with water to deluge the world in Ovid. Met. 1, v. 271.—Hesiod. Theog.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 480, l. 11, v. 585.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 694.——A river of Asia Minor, rising in Cappadocia and falling into the Euxine sea. Flacc. 5, v. 121.——A river of Pontus.

Irus, a beggar of Ithaca, who executed the commissions of Penelope's suitors. When Ulysses returned home, disguised in a beggars dress, Irus hindered him from entering the gates, and even challenged him. Ulysses brought him to the ground with a blow, and dragged him out of the house. Hom. Od. 8.—Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 7. v. 42.——A mountain of India.

Is, a small river falling into the Euphrates. Its waters abound with bitumen. Herodot. 1, c. 179.——A small town on the river of the same name. Id. ib.

Isadas, a Spartan, who, upon seeing the Thebans entering the city, stripped himself naked, and, with a spear and sword, engaged gaged the enemy. He was rewarded with a crown for his valor. Plut.

Isæa, one of the Nereides.

Isæus, an orator of Chalcis, in Eubœa, who came to Athens, and became there the pupil of Lysias, and soon after the master of Demosthenes. Some suppose that he reformed the dissipation and imprudence of his early years by frugality and temperance. Demosthenes imitated him in preference to Isocrates, because he studied force and energy of expression rather than floridness of stile. Ten of his sixty-four orations are extant. Juv. 3, v. 74.—Plut. de 10 Orat. Dem.——Another Greek orator, who came to Rome A.D. 17. He is greatly recommended by Pliny the younger, who observes, that he always spoke extempore, and wrote with elegance, unlabored ease, and great correctness.

Isamus, a river of India.

Isander, a son of Bellerophon, killed in the war which his father made against the Solymi. Homer. Il. 6.

Isapis, a river of Umbria. Lucan 2, v. 406.

Isar & Isara, a river of Gaul, where Fabius routed the Allobroges. Id. 1, v. 399.

Isar & Isæus, a river of Vindelicia. Strab. 4.

Isarchus, an Athenian archon, B.C. 424.

Isauria, a country of Asia Minor, near mount Taurus, whose inhabitants were bold and warlike. The Roman emperors, particularly Probus and Gallus, made war against them and conquered them. Flor. 3, c. 6.—Strab.

Isauricus, a surname of P. Servilius, from his conquests over the Isaurians.

Isaurus, a river of Umbria, falling into the Adriatic.——Another in Magna Græcia. Lucan. 2, v. 406.

Ischenia, an annual festival at Olympia, in honor of Ischenus, the grandson of Mercury and Hierea, who, in a time of famine, devoted himself to his country, and was honored with a monument near Olympia.

Ischolaus, a brave and prudent general of Sparta, &c. Polyæn.

Ischopŏlis, a town of Pontus.

Isia, certain festivals observed in honor of Isis, which continued nine days. It was usual to carry vessels full of wheat and barley, as the goddess was supposed to be the first who taught mankind the use of corn. These festivals were adopted by the Romans, where they soon degenerated into licentiousness. They were abolished by a decree of the senate, A.U.C. 696. They were introduced again, about 200 years after, by Commodus.

Isdegerdes, a king of Persia, appointed, by the will of Arcadius, guardian to Theodosius the Second. He died in his 31st year, A.D. 408.

Isiacorum portus, a harbour on the shore of the Euxine, near Dacia.

Isidorus, a native of Charax, in the age of Ptolemy Lagus, who wrote some historical treatises, besides a description of Parthia. ——A disciple of Chrysostom, called Peluſiota, from his living in Egypt. Of his epistles 2012 remain, written in Greek, with conciseness and elegance. The best edition is that of Paris, fol. 1638.——A Christian Greek writer, who flourished in the 7th century. He is surnamed Hiſpalenſis. His works have been edited, fol. de Breul, Paris 1601.

Isis, a celebrated deity of the Egyptians, daughter of Saturn and Rhea, according to Diodorus of Sicily. Some suppose her to be the same as Io, who was changed into a cow, and restored to her human form in Egypt, where she taught agriculture, and governed the people with mildness and equity, for which reasons she received divine honors after death. According to some traditions mentioned by Plutarch, Isis married her brother Osiris, and was pregnant by him even before she had left her mother's womb. These two ancient deities, as some authors observe, comprehended all nature and all the gods of the heathens. Isis was the Venus of Cyprus, the Minerva of Athens, the Cybele of the Phrygians, the Ceres of Eleusis, the Proserpine of Sicily, the Diana of Crete, the Bellona of the Romans, &c. Osiris and Isis reigned conjointly in Egypt; but the rebellion of Typhon, the brother of Osiris, proved fatal to this sovereign. [Vid. Oſiris & Typhon.] The ox and cow were the symbols of Osiris and Isis, because these deities, while on earth, had diligently applied themselves in cultivating the earth. [Vid. Apis.] As Isis was supposed to be the moon as Osiris the sun, she was represented as holding a globe in her hand, with a vessel full of ears of corn. The Egyptians believed that the yearly and regular inundations of the Nile proceeded from the abundant tears which Isis shed for the loss of Osiris, whom Typhon had basely murdered. The word Isis, according to some, signifies ancient, and, on that account, the inscriptions on the statues of the goddess were often in these words; I am all that has been, that ſhall be, and none among mortals has hitherto taken off my veil. The worship of Isis was universal in Egypt; the priests were obliged to observe perpetual chastity, their head was closely shaved, and they always walked barefooted, and clothed themselves in linen garments. They never eat onions, they abstained from salt with their meat, and were forbidden to eat the flesh of sheep and of hogs. During the night they were employed in continual devotion near the statue of the goddess. Cleopatra, the beautiful queen of Egypt, was wont to dress dreſs herſelf like this goddeſs, and affected to be called a ſecond Iſis. Cic. de Div. 1.—Plut. de Iſid. & Oſirid.—Diod. 1.—Dionyſ. Hal. 1.—Herodot. 2, c. 59.—Lucan. 1. v. 831.

Ismărus & Ismăra, a rugged mountain of Thrace, covered with vines and olives, near the Hebrus. Its wines are excellent. Homer. Od. 9.—Virg. G. 2, v. 37. Æn. 10, v. 351.——A Theban, ſon of Aſtacus.——A ſon of Eumolpus. Apollod.——A Lydian who accompanied Æneas to Italy, and fought with great vigor againſt the Rutuli. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 139.

Ismēne, a daughter of Œdipus and Jocaſta, who, when her ſiſter Antigone had been condemned to be buried alive by Creon, for giving burial to her brother Polynices, againſt the tyrant's poſitive orders, declared herſelf as guilty as her ſiſter, and inſiſted upon being equally puniſhed with her. This inſtance of generoſity was ſtrongly oppoſed by Antigone, who wiſhed not to ſee her ſiſter involved in her calamities. Sophocl. in Antig.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.——A daughter of the river Aſopus, who married the hundred-eyed Argus, by whom ſhe had Jaſus. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

Ismēnias, a celebrated muſician of Thebes. When he was taken priſoner by the Scythians, Atheas, the king of the country, obſerved, that he liked the muſic of Iſmenias better than the braying of an aſs. Plut. in Apoph.——A Theban, bribed by Timocrates of Rhodes, &c. Pauſ. 3, c. 9.——A Theban general, ſent to Perſia with an embaſſy by his countrymen. As none were admitted into the king's preſence without proſtrating themſelves at his feet, Iſmenias had recourſe to artifice to avoid doing an action which would prove diſgraceful to his country. When he was introduced he dropped his ring, and the motion he made to recover it from the ground was miſtaken for the moſt ſubmiſſive homage, and Iſmenias had a ſatisfactory audience of the monarch.——A river of Bœotia, falling into the Euripus, where Apollo had a temple, from which he was called Iſmenius. A youth was yearly choſen by the Bœotians to be the prieſt of the god, an office to which Hercules was once appointed. Pauſ. 9, c. 10—Ovid. Met. 2.—Strab. 9.

Ismēnides, an epithet applied to the Theban women, as being near the Iſmenus, a river of Bœotia. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 31.

Ismēnus, a ſon of Apollo and Melia, one of the Nereides, who gave his name to a river of Bœotia. Pauſ. 9, c. 10.——A ſon of Aſopus and Metope. Apollod. 3, c. 12.——A ſon of Amphion and Niobe, killed by Apollo. Id. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 6.

Isocrătes, a celebrated orator, ſon of a rich muſical inſtrument maker at Athens. He was taught in the ſchools of Gorgias and Prodicus, but his oratorical abilities were never diſplayed in public; and Iſocrates was prevented by an unconquerable timidity from ſpeaking in the popular aſſemblies. He opened a ſchool of eloquence at Athens, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the number, character, and fame, of his pupils, and by the immenſe riches which he amaſſed. He was intimate with Philip of Macedon, and regularly correſponded with him; and to his familiarity with that monarch the Athenians were indebted for the few peaceful years which they paſſed. The aſpiring ambition of Philip, however, diſpleaſed Iſocrates, and the defeat of the Athenians at Cheronæa had ſuch an effect upon his ſpirits, that he did not ſurvive the diſgrace of his country, but died, after he had been four days without taking any aliment, in the 99th year of his age, about 338 years before Chriſt. Iſocrates has always been much admired for the ſweetneſs and graceful ſimplicity of his ſtile, for the harmony of his expreſſions, and the dignity of his language. The remains of his orations extant inſpire the world with the higheſt veneration for his abilities, as a moraliſt, an orator, and, above all, as a man. His merit, however, is leſſened by thoſe who accuſe him of plagiariſm from the works of Thucydides, Lyſias, and others, ſeen particularly in his panygeric. He was ſo ſtudious of correctneſs that his lines are ſometimes poetry. The ſevere conduct of the Athenians againſt Socrates highly diſpleaſed him, and, in ſpite of all the undeſerved unpopularity of that great philoſopher, he put on mourning the day of his death. About 31 of his orations are extant. Iſocrates was honored after death with a brazen ſtatue by Timotheus, one of his pupils, and Apharæus, his adopted ſon. The beſt editions of Iſocrates are that of Battie, 2 vols. 8vo. Cantab. 1729, and that of Auger, 3 vols. 8vo. Paris 1782. Plut. de 10 Orat. &c.—*Cic. Issa, an iſland in the Adriatic ſea, on the coaſt of Dalmatia.——A town of Illyricum. Mela. 2, c. 7.—Strab. 1, &c.—Martial. 10, c. 25.

Issē, a daughter of Macareus, the ſon of Lycaon. She was beloved by Apollo, who, to obtain her confidence, changed himſelf into the form of a ſhepherd to whom ſhe was attached. This metamorphoſis of Apollo was repreſented on the web of Arachne. Ovid. Met. 6, c. 124.

Issus, a town of Silicia, on the confines of Syria, famous for a battle fought there between between Alexander the Great and the Perſians under Darius their king, in October, B.C. 333. In this battle the Perſians loſt, in the field of battle, 100,000 foot, and 10,000 horſe, and the Macedonians only 300 foot, and 150 horſe, according to Diodorus Siculus. The Perſian army, according to Juſtin, conſiſted of 400,000 foot and 100,000 horſe, and 61,000 of the former, and 10,000 of the latter, were left dead on the ſpot, and 40,000 were taken priſoners. The loſs of the Macedonians, as he farther adds, was no more than 130 foot and 150 horſe. According to Curtius, the Perſian ſlain amounted to 100,000 foot, and 10,000 horſe; and thoſe of Alexander to 32 foot, and 150 horſe, killed, and 504 wounded. This ſpot is likewiſe famous for the defeat of Niger by Severus, A.D. 194. Plut. in Alex.—Juſtin. 11, c. 9.—Curt. 3.—Arrian.—Diod. 17.

Isthmia, ſacred games among the Greeks, which received their name from the iſthmus of Corinth, where they were obſerved. They were celebrated in commemoration of Melicerta, who was changed into a ſea deity, when his mother Ino had thrown herſelf into the ſea with him in her arms. The body of Melicerta, according to ſome traditions, when caſt upon the ſea-ſhore, received an honorable burial, in memory of which the Iſthmian games were inſtituted, B.C. 1326. They were interrupted after they had been celebrated with great regularity during ſome years, and Theſeus at laſt reinſtituted them in honor of Neptune, whom he publicly called his father. Theſe games were obſerved every third, or rather fifth, year, and held ſo ſacred and inviolable, that even a public calamity could not prevent the celebration. When Corinth was deſtroyed by Mummius, the Roman general, they were obſerved with the uſual ſolemnity, and the Sicyonians were entruſted with the ſuperintendance, which had been before one of the privileges of the ruined Corinthians. Combats of every kind were exhibited, and the victors were rewarded with garlands of pine leaves. Some time after the cuſtom was changed, and the victor received a crown of dry and withered parſley. The years were reckoned by the celebration of the Iſthmian games, as among the Romans from the conſular government. Pauſ. Corint. &c.—Plut. in Theſ.

Isthmius, a king of Meſſenia, &c. Pauſ. 4, c. 3.

Isthmus, a ſmall neck of land with joins a country to another, and prevents the ſea from making them ſeparate, ſuch as the iſthmus of Corinth, which joins Peloponneſus to Greece. Nero attempted to cut it acroſs, and make a communication between the two ſeas, but in vain. Strab. 1.—Mela. 2, c. 2.—Plin. 4, c. 4.

Istiæotis, a country of Greece, near Oſſa. Vid. Hiſtiæotis.

Istria, a province at the weſt of Illyricum, at the top of the Adriatic ſea, whoſe inhabitants were originally pirates, and lived on plunder. They were not ſubjected to Rome till ſix centuries after the foundation of that city. Strab. 1.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Liv. 10, &c.—Plin. 3, c. 19.

Istropŏlis, a city of Thrace, near the mouth of the Iſter, founded by a Mileſian colony. Plin. 4, c. 11.

Isus & Antiphus, ſons of Priam, the latter by Hecuba, and the former by a concubine. They were ſeized by Achilles, as they fed their father's flocks on mount Ida: they were redeemed by Priam, and fought againſt the Greeks. They were both killed by Agamemnon. Homer. Il. 11.—A city of Bœotia. Strab. 9.

Itălia, a celebrated country of Europe, bounded on the eaſt by the Adriatic and Tyrrhene ſeas, and by the Alps. It has been compared, and with ſome ſimilitude, to a man's leg. It has borne, at different periods, the different names of Saturnia, Œnotria, Heſperia, Auſonia, and Tyrrhenia, and it received the name of Italy either from Italus, a king of the country, or from Italos, a Greek word, which ſignifies an ox, an animal very common in that part of Europe. The boundaries of Italy appeared to have been formed by nature itſelf, which ſeems to to have been particularly careful in ſupplying this country with whatever may contribute not only to the ſupport, but alſo to the pleaſures and luxuries, of life. It has been called the garden of Europe; and the panegyric which Pliny beſtows upon it ſeems not in any degree exaggerated. The ancient inhabitants called themſelves Aborigines, offſpring of the ſoil, and the country was ſoon after peopled by colonies from Greece. The Pelaſgi and the Arcadians made ſettlements there, and the whole country was divided into as many different governments as there were towns, till the rapid increaſe of the Roman power [Vid. Roma] changed the face of Italy, and united all its ſtates in ſupport of one common cauſe. Italy has been the mother of arts as well as of arms, and the immortal monuments which remain of the eloquence and poetical abilities of the inhabitants of Italy are well known. It was divided into eleven ſmall provinces or regions by Auguſtus. Ptol. 3, c. 1.—Dionyſ. Hal.—Diod. 4.—Juſtin. 4, &c.—C. Nep. in Dion.—Akib. &c.—Liv. 1, c. 2, &c.—*Varro de R. ITALĬCA, a town of Italy, called alſo Corſinium.

ITALĬCUS, a poet. Vid. Silius.

ITĂLUS, a ſon of Telegonus. Hygin. fab. 127.——An Arcadian prince, who came to Italy, where he eſtabliſhed a kingdom, called after him. It is ſuppoſed that he received divine honors after death, as Æneas calls upon him among the deities to whom he paid his adoration when he entered Italy. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 178.——A prince, whoſe daughter Roma married Æneas or Aſcanius. Plut. in Rom.——A king of the Cheruſci, &c. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 16.

ITARGIS, a river of Germany.

ITEA, a daughter of Danaus. Hygin. fab. 170.

ITEMALES, an old man who expoſed Œdipus on mount Citheron, &c. Hygin. fab. 65.

ITHĂCA, a celebrated iſland in the Ionian ſea, on the weſtern parts of Greece, with a city of the ſame name, famous for being part of the kingdom of Ulyſſes. It is very rocky and mountainous, meaſures about 25 miles in circumference, and is now known by the name of Iſola del Compare, or Thiachi. Hom. Il. & Od.—Strab. 1 & 8.—Mela. 2, c. 7.

ITHOBĂLUS, a king of Tyre, who died B. C. 595. Joſephus.

ITHŌME, a town of Phthiotis. Homer. Il. 2.——Another of Meſſenia, which ſurrendered, after ten years ſiege, to Lacedæmon, 724 years before the Chriſtian era. Jupiter was called Ithomates, from a temple which he had there, where games were alſo celebrated, and the conqueror rewarded with an oaken crown. Panſ. 4, c. 32.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 179.—Strab. 8.

ITHOMAIA, a feſtival in which muſicians contended, obſerved at Ithome, in honor of Jupiter, who had been nurſed by the nymphs Ithome and Neda, the former of whom gave her name to a city, and the latter to a river.

ITHYPHALLUS, a ſirname of Priapus. Columell. 10.

ITŌNIA, a ſirname of Minerva, from a place in Bœotia, where ſhe was worſhipped.

ITŌNUS, a king of Theſſaly, ſon of Deucalion, who firſt invented the manner of poliſhing metals. Lucan. 6, v. 402.

ITURÆA, a country of Paleſtine, whoſe inhabitants were very ſkilful in drawing the bow. Virg. G. 2, v. 448.

ITURUM, a town of Umbria.

ITYLUS, a ſon of Zethus and Ædon, killed by his mother. Vid. Ædon.

ITYRÆI, a people of Paleſtine. Vid. Ituræa.

ITYS, a ſon of Tereus, king of Thrace, by Procne, daughter of Pandion, king of Athens. He was killed by his mother when he was about ſix years old, and ſerved up before his father. He was changed into a pheaſant, his mother into a ſwallow, and his father into an owl. [Vid. Philomela.] Ovid. Met. 6, v. 620. Amor. 2, el. 14, v. 29.—Hor. 4, od. 12.——A Trojan, who came to Italy with Æneas, and was killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 574.

JUBA, a king of Numidia and Mauritania, who ſucceeded his father Hiempſal, and favored the cauſe of Pompey againſt J. Cæſar. He defeated Curio, whom Cæſar had ſent to Africa, and after the battle of Pharſalia, he joined his forces to thoſe of Scipio. He was conquered in a battle at Thapſus, and totally abandoned by his ſubjects. He killed himſelf with Petreius, who had ſhared his good fortune and his adverſity. His kingdom became a Roman province, of which Salluſt was the firſt governor. Plut. in Pomp. & Cæſ.—Flor. 4, c. 12.—Suet. in Cæſ. c. 35.—Dion. 41.—Mela. 1, c. 6.—Lucan. 3, &c.—Cæſar. de bell. civ. 2.—Paterc. 2, c. 54.—The ſecond of that name was the ſon of Juba the Firſt. He was led among the captives to Rome to adorn the triumph of Cæſar. His captivity was the ſource of the greateſt honors, and his application to ſtudy procured him more glory than he would have obtained from the inheritance of a kingdom. He gained the heart of the Romans by the courteouſneſs of his manners, and Auguſtus rewarded his fidelity by giving him in marriage Cleopatra, the daughter of Antony, and conferring upon him the title of king, and making him maſter of all the territories which his father once poſſeſſed. His popularity was ſo great, that the Mauritanians rewarded his benevolence by making him one of their gods. The Athenians raiſed him a ſtatue, and the Æthiopians worſhipped him as a deity. Juba wrote an hiſtory of Rome in Greek, which is often quoted and commended by the ancients; of it only few fragments remain. He alſo wrote on the hiſtory of Arabia, and the antiquities of Aſſyria, chiefly collected from Beroſus. Beſides theſe, he compoſed ſome treatiſes upon the drama, Roman antiquities, the nature of animals, painting, grammar, &c. now loſt. Strab. 17.—Sueton. in Cal. 26.—Plin. 5, c. 25, & 31.—Dion. 51, &c.

JUDACILIUS, a native of Aſculum, celebrated for his patriotiſm, in the age of Pompey, &c.

JUDÆA, a famous country of Syria, bounded by Arabia, Egypt, Phœnicia, the Mediterranean ſea, and part of Syria. The inhabitants, whoſe hiſtory is beſt collected from the Holy Scriptures, were chiefly governed, after the Babyloniſh captivity, by the high prieſts, who raiſed themſelves to the rank of princes, B. C. 153, and continued in the enjoyment of regal power till the age of Auguſtus. Plut. de Oſir.—Strab. 16.—Dion. 36.—Tacit. Hiſt. 5, c. 6.

JUGANTES, a people of Britain. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 32.

JUGARIUS, a ſtreet in Rome, below the capitol.

JUGURTHA, the illegitimate ſon of Manaſtabal, the brother of Micipſa. Micipſa and Manaſtabal were the ſons of Maſiniſſa, king of Numidia. Micipſa, who had inherited his father's kingdom, educated his nephew with his two ſons Adherbal and Hiempſal; but, as he was of an aſpiring diſpoſition, he ſent him with a body of troops to the aſſiſtance of Scipio, who was beſieging Numantia, hoping to loſe a youth whoſe ambition ſeemed to threaten the tranquillity of his children. His hopes were fruſtrated, Jugurtha ſhowed himſelf brave and active, and endeared himſelf to the Roman general. Micipſa appointed him ſucceſſor to his kingdom with his two ſons, but the kindneſs of the father proved fatal to the children. Jugurtha deſtroyed Hiempſal, and ſtripped Adherbal of his poſſeſſions, and obliged him to fly to Rome for ſafety. The Romans liſtened to the well-grounded complaints of Adherbal, but Jugurtha's gold prevailed among the ſenators, and the ſuppliant monarch, forſaken in his diſtreſs, periſhed by the ſnares of his enemy. Cæcilius Metellus was at laſt ſent againſt Jugurtha, and his firmneſs and ſucceſs ſoon reduced the crafty Numidian, and obliged him to fly among his ſavage neighbours for ſupport. Marius and Sylla ſucceeded Metellus, and fought with equal ſucceſs. Jugurtha was at laſt betrayed by his father-in-law Bocchus, from whom he claimed aſſiſtance, and he was delivered into the hands of Sylla, after carrying on a war of five years. He was expoſed to the view of the Roman people, and dragged in chains to adorn the triumph of Marius. He was afterwards put in a priſon, where he died ſix days after of hunger, B. C. 106. Salluſt. in Jug.—Flor. 3, c. 1.—Paterc. 2, c. 10, &c.—Plut. in Mar.

JULIA LEX, prima de provinciis, by J. Cæſar, A. U. C. 691. It confirmed the freedom of all Greece; it ordained that the Roman magiſtrates ſhould act there as judges, and that the towns and villages through which the Roman magiſtrates and ambaſſadors paſſed, ſhould maintain them during their ſtay; that the governors, at the expiration of their office, ſhould leave a ſcheme of their accounts in two cities of their province, and deliver a copy of it at the public treaſury; that the provincial governors ſhould not accept of a golden crown unleſs they were honored with a triumph by the ſenate; that no ſupreme commander ſhould go out of his province, enter any dominions, lead an army, or engage in a war, without the previous approbation and command of the Roman ſenate and people.——Another, de ſumptibus, in the age of Auguſtus, It limited the expence of proviſions on the dies profeſti, or days appointed for the tranſaction of buſineſs, to 200 ſeſterces; on common calendar feſtivals to 300; and, on all extraordinary occaſions, ſuch as marriages, births, &c. to 1000.——Another, de provinciis, by J. Cæſar Dictator. It ordained that no pretorian province ſhould be held more than one year, and a conſular province more than two years——Another, called alſo Campana agraria, by the ſame, A. U. C. 691. It required that all the lands of Campania, formerly rented according to the eſtimation of the ſtate, ſhould be divided among the plebeians, and that all the members of the ſenate ſhould bind themſelves by an oath to eſtabliſh, confirm, and protect, that law.——Another, de civitate, by L. J. Cæſar, A. U. C 664. It rewarded with the name and privileges of citizens of Rome all ſuch as, during the civil wars, had remained the conſtant friends of the republican liberty. When that civil war was at an end, all the Italians were admitted as free denizens, and compoſed eight new tribes.——Another, de judicibus, by J. Cæſar. It confirmed the Pompeian law in a certain manner, requiring the judges to be choſen from the richeſt people in every century, allowing the ſenators and knights in the number, and excluding the tribuni ærarii.——Another, de ambitu, by Auguſtus. It reſtrained the illicit meaſures uſed at elections, and reſtored to the comitia their ancient privileges, which had been deſtroyed by the ambition and bribery of J. Cæſar.——Another, by Auguſtus, de adulteriis & pudicitiâ. It puniſhed adultery with death. It was afterwards confirmed and enforced by Domitian. Juvenal. Sat. 2, v. 30, alludes to it.——Another, called alſo Papia, or Papia Poppæa, which was the ſame as the following, only enlarged by the conſuls Papius and Poppæus, A. U. C. 762.——Another, de maritandis ordinibus, by Auguſtus. It propoſed rewards to ſuch as engaged in matrimony, of a particular deſcription. It inflicted puniſhment on celibacy, and permitted the patricians, the ſenators and ſons of ſenators excepted, to intermarry with the libertini, or children of thoſe that had been liberti, or ſervants manumitted. Horace alludes to it when he ſpeaks of lex marita.——Another, de majeſtate, by J. Cæſar. It puniſhed with aquæ & ignis interdictio all ſuch as were found guilty of the crimen majeſtatis, or treaſon againſt the ſtate.

JULIA, a daughter of J. Cæſar, by Cornelia, famous for her perſonal charms and for her virtues. She married Corn. Cæpio, whom her father obliged her to divorce to marry Pompey the Great. Her amiable diſpoſition more ſtrongly cemented the friendſhip of the father and of the ſon-in-law; but her ſudden death in child-bed, B. C. 53, broke all ties of intimacy and relationſhip, and ſoon produced a civil war. Plut.——The mother of M. Antony, whoſe humanity is greatly celebrated in ſaving her brother-in-law J. Cæſar from the cruel proſecutions of her ſon. ——An aunt of J. Cæſar, who married C. Marius. Her funeral oration was publicly pronounced by her nephew.——The only daughter of the emperor Auguſtus, remarkable for her beauty, genius, and debaucheries. She was tenderly loved by her father, who gave her in marriage to Marcellus; after whoſe death ſhe was given to Agrippa, by whom ſhe had five children. She became a ſecond time a widow, and was married to Tiberius. Her laſciviouſneſs and debaucheries ſo diſguſted her huſband, that he retired from the court of the emperor; and Auguſtus, informed of her luſtful propenſities and infamy, baniſhed her from his ſight, and confined her in a ſmall iſland on the coaſt of Campania. She was ſtarved to death, A. D. 14, by order of Tiberius, who had ſucceeded to Auguſtus as emperor of Rome. Plut.——A daughter of the emperor Titus, who proſtituted herſelf to her brother Domitian.——A daughter of Julia, the wife of Agrippa, who married Lepidus, and was baniſhed for her licentiouſneſs.——A daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, born in the iſland of Leſbos, A D. 17. She married a ſenator called M. Vinucius, at the age of 16, and enjoyed the moſt unbounded favors in the court of her brother Caligula, who is accuſed of being her firſt ſeducer. She was baniſhed by Caligula, on ſuſpicion of conſpiracy. Claudius recalled her; but ſhe was ſoon after baniſhed by the powerful intrigues of Meſſalina, and put to death about the 24th year of her age. She was no ſtranger to the debaucheries of the age, and ſhe proſtituted herſelf as freely to the meaneſt of the people as to the nobler companions of her brother's extravagance. Seneca, as ſome ſuppoſe, was baniſhed to Corſica for having ſeduced her. ——A celebrated woman, born in Phœnicia. She is alſo called Domna. She applied herſelf to the ſtudy of geometry and philoſophy, &c. and rendered herſelf conſpicuous, as much by her mental as by her perſonal charms. She came to Rome, where her learning recommended her to all the literati of the age. She married Septimius Severus, who, twenty years after this matrimonial connection, was inveſted with the imperial purple. Severus was guided by the prudence and advice of Julia, but he was blind to her foibles, and often puniſhed with the greateſt ſeverity thoſe vices which were enormous in the empreſs. She is even ſaid to have conſpired againſt the emperor, but ſhe reſolved to blot, by patronizing literature, the ſpots which her debauchery and extravagance had rendered indelible in the eyes of virtue. Her influence, after the death of Severus, was for ſome time productive of tranquillity and cordial union between his two ſons and ſucceſſors. Geta at laſt, however, fell a ſacrifice to his brother Caracalla, and Julia was even wounded in the arm while ſhe attempted to ſcreen her favorite ſon from his brother's dagger. According to ſome, Julia committed inceſt with her ſon Caracalla, and publicly married him. She ſtarved herſelf when her ambitious views were defeated by Macrinus, who aſpired to the empire in preference to her, after the death of Caracalla.——A town of Gallia Togata.

JULIANUS, a ſon of Julius Conſtantius, the brother of Conſtantine the Great, born at Conſtantinople. The maſſacre which attended the elevation of the ſons of Conſtantine the Great to the throne, nearly proved fatal to Julian and to his brother Gallus. The two brothers were privately educated together, and taught the doctrines of the Chriſtian religion, and exhorted to be modeſt, temperate, and to deſpiſe the gratification of all ſenſual pleaſures. Gallus received the inſtructions of his pious teachers with deference and ſubmiſſion, but Julian ſhowed his diſlike for Chriſtianity by ſecretly cheriſhing a deſire to become one of the votaries of Paganiſm. He gave ſufficient proofs of this propenſity when he went to Athens in the 24th year of his age, where he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of magic and aſtrology. He was ſome time after appointed over Gaul, with the title of Cæſar, by Conſtans, and there he ſhewed himſelf worthy of the imperial dignity by his prudence, valor, and the numerous victories he obtained over the enemies of Rome in Gaul and Germany. His mildneſs, as well as his condeſcenſion, gained him the hearts of his ſoldiers, and when Conſtans, to whom Julian was become ſuſpected, ordered him to ſend him part of his forces to go into the eaſt, the army immediately mutinied, and promiſed immortal fidelity to their leader, by refuſing to obey the orders of Conſtans. They even compelled Julian, by threats and entreaties, to accept of the title of independent emperor and of Auguſtus; and the death of Conſtans, which ſoon after happened, left him ſole maſter of the Roman empire, A. D. 361. Julian then diſcloſed his religious ſentiments, and publicly diſavowed the doctrines of Chriſtianity, and offered ſolemn ſacrifices to all the gods of ancient Rome. This change of religious opinion was attributed to the auſterity with which he received the precepts of Chriſtianity, or, according to others, to the literary converſation and perſuaſive eloquence of ſome of the Athenian philoſophers. From this circumſtance, therefore, Julian has been called Apoſtate. After he had made his his public entry at Conſtantinople, he determined to continue the Perſian war, and check thoſe barbarians, who had for ſixty years derided the indolence of the Roman emperors. When he had croſſed the Tigris, he burned his fleet, and advanced with boldneſs into the enemy's country. His march was that of a conqueror, he met with no oppoſition from a weak and indigent enemy; but the country of Aſſyria had been left deſolate by the Perſians, and Julian, without corn or proviſions, was obliged to retire. As he could not convey his fleet again over the ſtreams of the Tigris, he took the reſolution of marching up the ſources of the river, and imitate the bold return of the ten thouſand Greeks. As he advanced through the country he defeated the officers of Sapor, the king of Perſia; but an engagement proved fatal to him, and he received a deadly wound as he animated his ſoldiers to battle. He expired the following night, the 27th of June, A. D. 363, in the 32d year of his age. His laſt moments were ſpent in a converſation with a philoſopher about the immortality of the ſoul, and he breathed his laſt without expreſſing the leaſt ſorrow for his fate, or the ſuddenneſs of his death. Julian's character has been admired by ſome, and cenſured by others; but the malevolence of his enemies ariſes from his apoſtacy. As a man and as a monarch he demands our warmeſt commendations; but we muſt blame his idolatry, and deſpiſe his bigotted principles. He was moderate in his ſucceſſes, merciful to his enemies, and amiable in his character. He aboliſhed the luxuries which reigned in the court of Conſtantinople, and diſmiſſed with contempt the numerous officers which waited upon Conſtantius, to anoint his head or perfume his body. He was frugal in his meals, and ſlept little, repoſing himſelf on a ſkin ſpread on the ground. He awoke at midnight, and ſpent the reſt of the night in reading or writing, and iſſued early from his tent to pay his daily viſit to the guards around the camp. He was not fond of public amuſements, but rather dedicated his time to ſtudy and ſolitude. When he paſſed through Antioch in his Perſian expedition, the inhabitants of the place, offended at his religious ſentiments, ridiculed his perſon, and lampooned him in ſatyrical verſes. The emperor made uſe of the ſame arms for his defence, and rather than deſtroy his enemies by the ſword, he condeſcended to expoſe them to deriſion, and unveil their follies and debaucheries in an humorous work, which he called Miſopogon, or beard hater. He imitated the virtuous example of Scipio and Alexander, and laid no temptation for his virtue by viſiting ſome female captives that had fallen into his hands. In his matrimonial connections, Julian rather conſulted policy than inclination, and his marriage with the ſiſter of Conſtantius aroſe from his unwillingneſs to offend his benefactor, rather than to obey the laws of nature. He was buried at Tarſus, and afterwards his body was conveyed to Conſtantinople. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his writings, as well as by his military character. Beſides his Miſopogon, he wrote the hiſtory of Gaul. He alſo wrote two letters to the Athenians; and, beſides, there are now extant ſixty-four letters on various ſubjects. His Cæſars is the moſt famous of all his compoſitions, being a ſatire upon all the Roman emperors from J. Cæſar to Conſtantine. It is written in the form of a dialogue, in which the author ſeverely attacks the venerable character of M. Aurelius, whom he had propoſed to himſelf as a pattern, and ſpeaks in a ſcurrilous and abuſive language of his relation Conſtantine. It has been obſerved of Julian, that, like Cæſar, he could employ at the ſame time his hand to write, his ear to liſten, his eyes to read, and his mind to dictate. The beſt edition of his works is that of Spanheim, fol. Lipſ. 1696; and of the Cæſars, that of Heuſinger, 8vo. Gothæ, 1741. Julian.—Socrat.—Eutrop.—Ammian.—Liban. &c.——A ſon of Conſtantine.——A maternal uncle of the emperor Julian.—A Roman emperor. [*Vid. JULII, a family of Alba, brought to Rome by Romulus, where they ſoon roſe to the greateſt honors of the ſtate. J. Cæſar and Auguſtus were of this family; and it was ſaid, perhaps through flattery, that they were lineally deſcended from Æneas, the founder of Lavinium.

JULIOMAGUS, a city of Gaul.

JULIOPOLIS, a town of Bithynia.

JULIS, a town of the iſland of Cos, which gave birth to Simonides, &c. The walls of this city were all marble, and there are now ſome pieces remaining entire above 12 feet in height, as the monuments of its ancient ſplendor. Plin. 4, c. 12.

JULIUS CÆSAR. Vid. Cæſar.——Agricola, a governor of Britain, A. C. 80, who firſt diſcovered that Britain was an iſland by ſailing round it. His ſon-in-law, the hiſtorian Tacitus, has written an account of his life. Tacit. in Agric.——Obſequens, a Latin writer, who floriſhed A. D. 214. The beſt edition of his book de prodigiis is that of Oudendorp, 8vo. L. Bat. 1720.——Agrippa, baniſhed from Rome by Nero, after the diſcovery of the Piſonian conſpiracy. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 71.——Solinus, a writer. Vid. Solinus.——Titianus, a writer in the age of Dio-cletian. His ſon became famous for his oratorical powers, and was made preceptor in the family of Maximinus. Julius wrote a hiſtory of all the provinces of the Roman empire, greatly commended by the ancients. He alſo wrote ſome letters, in which he happily imitated the ſtile and elegance of Cicero, for which he was called the ape of his age.——Africanus, a chronologer, who floriſhed A. D. 220.——Conſtantius, the father of the emperor Julian, was killed at the acceſſion of the ſons of Conſtantine to the throne, and his ſon nearly ſhared his fate.——Pollux, a grammarian of Naupactum, in Egypt. Vid. Pollux.——Canus, a celebrated Roman, put to death by order of Caracalla. He bore the undeſerved puniſhment inflicted on him with the greateſt reſignation, and even pleaſure.——Proculus, a Roman, who ſolemnly declared to his countrymen, after Romulus had diſappeared, that he had ſeen him above an human ſhape, and that he had ordered him to tell the Romans to honor him as a god. Julius was believed. Plut. in Rom.—Ovid.——Florus. Vid. Florus.——L. Cæſar, a Roman conſul, uncle to Antony the triumvir, the father of Cæſar the dictator. He died as he was putting on his ſhoes.——Celſus, a tribune impriſoned for conſpiring againſt Tiberius. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 14.——Maximinus, a Thracian, who, from a ſhepherd, became an emperor of Rome. Vid. Maximinus.

IULUS, the name of Aſcanius, the ſon of Æneas. Vid. Aſcanius.——A ſon of Aſcanius, born in Lavinium. In the ſucceſſion to the kingdom of Alba, Æneas Sylvius, the ſon of Æneas and Lavinia, was preferred to him. He was, however, made chief prieſt. Dionyſ. 1——A ſon of Antony the triumvir and Fulvia. Vid. Antonius Julius.

JUNIA LEX Sacrata, by L. Junius Brutus, the firſt tribune of the people, A. U. C. 260. It ordained that the perſon of the tribune ſhould be held ſacred and inviolable; that an appeal might be made from the conſuls to the tribunes; and that no ſenator ſhould be able to exerciſe the office of a tribune.——Another, A. U. C. 627, which excluded all foreigners from enjoying the privileges or names of Roman citizens.

JUNIA, a niece of Cato of Utica, who married Caſſius, and died 64 years after her huſband had killed himſelf at the battle of Philippi.——Calvina, a beautiful Roman lady, accuſed of inceſt with her brother Silanus. She was deſcended from Auguſtus. She was baniſhed by Claudius, and recalled by Nero. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 4——Blæſus, a proconſul of Africa under the emperors. Tacit. An. 3, c. 35.——Lupus, a ſenator who accuſed Vitellius of aſpiring to the ſovereignty, &c. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 42.——D. Silanus, a Roman who committed adultery with Julia, the grand-daughter of Auguſtus, &c. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 24.——Brutus. Vid. Brutus.

JUNO, a celebrated deity among the ancients, daughter of Saturn and Ops. She was ſiſter to Jupiter, Pluto, Neptune, Veſta, Ceres, &c. She was born at Argos, or, according to others, in Samos, and was entruſted to the care of the Seaſons, or, as Homer and Ovid mention, to Oceanus and Thetys. Some of the inhabitants of Argolis ſuppoſed, that ſhe had been brought up by the three daughters of the river Aſterion; and the people of Stymphalus, in Arcadia, maintained, that ſhe had been educated under the care of Temenus, the ſon of Pelaſgus. Juno was devoured by Saturn, according to ſome mythologiſts; and, according to Apollodorus, ſhe was again reſtored to the world by means of a potion which Metis gave to Saturn, to make him give up the ſtone which his wife had given him to ſwallow inſtead of Jupiter. [Vid. Saturnus.] Jupiter was not inſenſible to the charms of his ſiſter, and the more powerfully to gain her confidence, he changed himſelf into a cuckoo, and raiſed a great ſtorm, and made the air uncommonly chill and cold. Under this form he went to the goddeſs, all ſhivering. Juno pitied the cuckoo, and took him into her boſom. When Jupiter had gained theſe advantages, he reſumed his original form, and obtained the gratification of his deſires, after he had made a ſolemn promiſe of marriage to his ſiſter. The nuptials of Jupiter and Juno were celebrated with the greateſt ſolemnity; the gods, all mankind, and all the brute creation, attended. Chelone, a young woman, was the only one who refuſed to come, and who derided the ceremony. For this impiety, Mercury changed her into a tortoiſe, and condemned her to perpetual ſilence; from which circumſtance the tortoiſe has always been uſed as the ſymbol of ſilence among the ancients. By her marriage with Jupiter Juno became the queen of all the gods, and miſtreſs of heaven and earth. Her conjugal happineſs, however, was frequently diſturbed by the numerous amours of her huſband, and ſhe ſhewed herſelf jealous and inexorable in the higheſt degree. Her ſeverity to the miſtreſſes and illegitimate children of her huſband was unparalleled. She perſecuted Hercules and his deſcendants with the moſt inveterate fury; and her reſentment againſt Paris, who had given the golden apple to Venus in preference to herſelf, was the cauſe of the Trojan war, and of all the miſeries which happened to the unfortunate houſe of Priam. Her severities to Alcmena, Ino, Athamas, Semele, &c. are alſo well known. Juno had ſome children by Jupiter. According to Heſiod, ſhe was mother of Mars, Hebe, and Ilithya, or Lucina; and, beſides theſe, ſhe brought forth Vulcan, without having any commerce with the other ſex, but only by ſmelling a certain plant. This was in imitation of Jupiter, who had produced Minerva from his brain. According to others, it was not Vulcan, but Mars, or Hebe, that ſhe brought forth in this manner, and this was after eating ſome lettuces at the table of Apollo. The daily and repeated debaucheries of Jupiter at laſt provoked Juno to ſuch a degree, that ſhe retired to Eubœa, and reſolved for ever to forſake his bed. Jupiter produced a reconciliation, after he had applied to Cithæron for advice, and after he had obtained forgiveneſs by fraud and artifice. [Vid. Dædala.] This reconciliation, however cordial it might appear, was ſoon diſſolved by new offences, and, to ſtop the complaints of the jealous Juno, Jupiter had often recourſe to violence and blows. He even puniſhed the cruelties which ſhe had exerciſed upon his ſon Hercules, by ſuſpending her from the heavens by a golden chain, and tying a heavy anvil to her feet. Vulcan was puniſhed for aſſiſting his mother in this degrading ſituation, and he was kicked down from heaven by his father, and broke his leg by the fall. This puniſhment rather irritated than provoked Juno. She reſolved to revenge it, and engage ſome of the gods to conſpire againſt Jupiter, and to impriſon him. Thetis delivered him from this conſpiracy, by bringing to his aſſiſtance the famous Briareus. Apollo and Neptune were baniſhed from heaven for joining in the conſpiracy, though ſome attribute their exile to different cauſes. The worſhip of Juno was univerſal, and even more than that of Jupiter, according to ſome authors. Her ſacrifices were offered with the greateſt ſolemnity. She was particularly worſhipped at Argos, Samos, Carthage, and afterwards at Rome. The anciants generally offered on her altars an ewe lamb and a ſow the firſt day of every month. No cows were ever immolated to her, becauſe ſhe aſſumed the nature of that animal when the gods fled into Egypt in their war with the giants. Among the birds, the hawk, the gooſe, and particularly the peacock, often called Junonia avis, [Vid. Argus.] were ſacred to her. The dittany, the poppy, and the lilly, were her favorite flowers. The latter flower was originally of the color of the crocus; but, when Jupiter placed Hercules to the breaſts of Juno while aſleep, ſome of her milk fell down upon earth, and changed the color of the lilies from purple to a beautiful white. Some of the milk alſo dropped in that part of the heavens which, from its whiteneſs, ſtill retains the name of the milky way, lactea via. As Juno's power was extended over all the gods, ſhe often made uſe of the goddeſs Minerva as her meſſenger, and even had the privilege of hurling the thunder of Jupiter when ſhe pleaſed. Her temples were numerous, the moſt famous of which were at Argos, Olympia, &c. At Rome no woman of a debauched character was permitted to enter her temple, or even to touch it. The ſirnames of Juno are various, they are derived either from the function or things over which ſhe preſided, or from the places where her worſhip was eſtabliſhed. She was the queen of the heavens; ſhe protected cleanlineſs, and preſided over marriage and child-birth, and particularly patronized the moſt faithful and virtuous of the ſex, and ſeverely puniſhed incontinence and lewdneſs in matrons. She was the goddeſs of all power and empire, and ſhe was alſo the patroneſs of riches. She is repreſented ſitting on a throne with a diadem on her head, and a golden ſceptre in her right hand. Some peacocks generally ſat by her, and a cuckoo often perched on her ſceptre, while Iris behind her diſplayed the thouſand colors of her beautiful rainbow. She is ſometimes carried through the air in a rich chariot drawn by peacocks. The Roman conſuls, when they entered upon office, were always obliged to offer her a ſolemn ſacrifice. The Juno of the Romans was called Matrona or Romana. She was generally repreſented as veiled from head to foot, and the Roman matrons always imitated this manner of dreſſing themſelves, and deemed it indecent in any married woman to leave any part of her body but her face uncovered. She has received the ſirname of Olympia, Samia, Lacedæmonia, Argiva, Telchinia, Candrena, Reſcinthes, Proſymna, Imbraſia, Acrea, Cithæronia, Bunea, Ammonia, Fluonia, Anthea, Migale, Gemella, Tropeia, Boopis, Parthenos, Teleia, Xera, Egophage, Hyperchinia, Juga, Ilithyia Lucina, Pronuba, Caprotina, Mena, Popolonia Lacinia, Soſpita, Moneta, Curis, Domiduca, Februa, Opigenia, &c. *Cic. de Nat. Jupiter, the most powerful of all the gods of the ancients. According to Varro, there were no less than 300 persons of that name; Diodorus mentions two; and Cicero three, two of Arcadia, and one of Crete. To that of Crete, who passed for the son of Saturn and Ops, the actions of the rest have been attributed. According to the opinion of the mythologists, Jupiter was saved from destruction by his mother, and entrusted to the care of the Corybantes. Saturn, who had received the kingdom of the world from his brother Titan on condition of not raising male children, devoured all his sons as soon as born; but Ops, offended at her husband's cruelty, secreted Jupiter, and gave a stone to Saturn, which he devoured on the supposition that it was a male child. Jupiter was educated in a cave on mount Ida, in Crete, and fed upon the milk of the goat Amalthæa, or upon honey, according to others. He received the name of Jupiter, quasi juvans pater. His cries were drowned by the noise of cymbals and drums, which the Corybantes beat at the express command of Ops. [Vid. Corybantes.] As soon as he was a year old, Jupiter found himself sufficiently strong to make war against the Titans, who had imprisoned his father because he had brought up male children. The Titans were conquered, and Saturn set at liberty by the hands of his son. Saturn however, soon after, apprehensive of the power of Jupiter, conspired against his life, and was, for this treachery, driven from his kingdom, and obliged to fly for safety into Latium. Jupiter, now become the sole master of the empire of the world, divided it with his brothers. He reserved for himself the kingdom of heaven, and gave the empire of the sea to Neptune, and that of the infernal regions to Pluto. The peaceful beginning of his reign was soon interrupted by the rebellion of the giants, who were sons of the earth, and who wished to revenge the death of their relations the Titans. They were so powerful that they hurled rocks, and heaped up mountains upon mountains, to scale heaven, so that all the gods, to avoid their fury, fled to Egypt, where they escaped the danger by assuming the form of different animals. Jupiter, however, animated them, and, by the assistance of Hercules, he totally overpowered this gigantic race, which had proved such tremendous enemies. [Vid. Gigantes.] Jupiter, now freed from every enemy, gave himself up to the pursuit of pleasures. He married Metis, Themis, Eurionyme, Ceres, Mnemosyne, Latona, and Juno. [Vid. Juno.] He became a Proteus to gratify his passions. He introduced himself to Danae in a shower of gold, he corrupted Antiope in the form of a satyr, and Leda in the form of a swan; he became a bull to seduce Europa, and he enjoyed the company of Ægina in the form of a flame of fire. He assumed the habit of Diana to corrupt Callisto, and became Amphitryon to gain the affections of Alcmena. His children were also numerous as well as his mistresses. According to Apollodorus 1, c. 3. he was father of the Seasons, Irene, Eunomia, the Fates, Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos, by Themis; of Venus, by Dione; of the Graces, Aglaia, Euphrosyne, and Thalia, by Eurynome, the daughter of Oceanus; of Proserpine, by Styx; of the nine Muses, by Mnemosyne, &c. [Vid. Niobe, Laodamia, Pyrrha, Prometheus, Electra, Maia, Semele, &c.] The worship of Jupiter was universal; he was the Ammon of the Africans, the Belus of Babylon, the Osiris of Egypt, &c. His surnames were numerous, many of which he received from the place or functions over which he presided. He was severally called Jupiter Feretrius, Inventor, Elicius, Capitolinus, Latialis, Pistor, Sponsor, Herceus, Anxurus, Victor, Maximus, Optimus, Olympius, Fluvialis, &c. The worship of Jupiter surpassed that of the other gods in solemnity. His altars were not like those of Saturn and Diana, stained with the blood of human victims, but he was delighted with the sacrifice of goats, sheep, and white bulls. The oak is sacred to him because he first taught mankind to live upon acorns. He is generally represented as sitting upon a golden or ivory throne, holding, in one hand, thunderbolts just ready to be hurled, and, in the other, a sceptre of cyprus. His looks express majesty, his beard flows long and neglected, and the eagle stands with expanded wings at his feet. He is sometimes represented with the upper parts of his body naked, and those below the waist carefully covered, as if to show that he is visible to the gods above, but that he is concealed from the sight of the inhabitants of the earth. Jupiter had several oracles, the most celebrated of which were at Dodona, and Ammon, in Libya. As Jupiter was the king and father of gods and men, his power was extended over the deities, and every thing was subservient to his will, except the Fates. From him mankind received their blessings and their miseries, and they looked upon him as acquainted with every thing, past, present, and future. He was represented at Olympia with a crown like olive branches; his mantle was variegated with different flowers, particularly by the lily, and the eagle perched on the top of the sceptre which he held in his hand. The Cretans represented Jupiter without ears, to signify that the sovereign master of the world ought not to give a partial ear to any particular person, but be equally candid and propitious to all. At Lacedæmon he appeared with four heads, that he

he might ſeem to hear with greater readineſs the different prayers and ſolicitations which were daily poured to him from every part of the earth. It is ſaid, that Minerva came all armed from his brains when he ordered Vulcan to open his head. Pauſ. 1, 2, &c.—Liv. 1, 4, 5, &c.—Diod. 1 & 3.—*Homer. JUSTINUS M. JUNIANUS, a Latin hiſtorian in the age of Antoninus, who epitomized the hiſtory of Trogus Pompeius. This epitome, according to ſome traditions, was the cauſe that the comprehenſive work of Trogus was loſt. It comprehends the hiſtory of the Aſſyrian, Perſian, Grecian, Macedonian, Roman empires, &c. in a neat and elegant ſtile. It is replete with many judicious reflexions, and animated harangues; but the author is often too credulous, and ſometimes examines events too minutely, while others are related only in a few words too often obſcure. The indecency of many of his expreſſions is deſervedly cenſured.——The beſt editions of Juſtin are that of Ab. Gronovius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1719. that of Hearne, 8vo. Oxon, 1703. and that of Barbou, 12mo. JUTURNA, a ſiſter of Turnus, king of the Rutuli. She heard with contempt the addreſſes of Jupiter, or, according to others, ſhe was raviſhed by him, and made immortal. She was afterwards changed into a fountain near the Numicus. The waters of that fountain were uſed in ſacrifices and particularly in thoſe of Veſta. They had the power to heal diſeaſes. *Varro de L. JUVENALIS, Decius Junius, a poet born at Aquinum in Italy. He came early to Rome, and paſſed ſome time in declaiming; after which he applied himſelf to write ſatires, 16 of which are extant. He ſpoke with virulence againſt the partiality of Nero for the pantomime Paris, and though all his ſatire and declamation were pointed againſt this ruling favorite of the emperor, yet Juvenal lived in ſecurity during the reign of Nero. After the death of Nero, the effects of the reſentment of Paris were ſeverely felt, and the ſatiriſt was ſent by Domitian, as governor on the frontiers of Egypt. Juvenal was then in the 80th year of his age, and he ſuffered much from the trouble which attended his office or rather his exile. He returned, however, to Rome after the death of Paris, and died in the reign of Trajan, A. D. 128. His writings are fiery and animated, and they abound with humor. He is particularly ſevere upon the vice and diſſipation of the age he lived in, but the groſs and indecent manner in which he expoſes to ridicule the follies of mankind, rather encourages than diſarms the debauched and licentious. He wrote with acrimony againſt all his adverſaries, and whatever diſpleaſed or offended him was expoſed to his ſevereſt cenſure. It is to be acknowledged, that Juvenal is far more correct than his contemporaries, a circumſtance, which ſome have attributed to his judgment and experience, which were uncommonly mature, as his ſatires were the productions of old age. He may be called, and with reaſon, perhaps, the laſt of the Roman poets. After him poetry decayed, and nothing more claims our attention as a perfect poetical compoſition.—The beſt editions are thoſe of Caſaubon, 4to. L. Bat. 1695, with Perſius, and of Hawkey, Dublin, 12mo. 1746. and of Grævius cum notis variorum, 8vo. L. Bat. 1684.

IXION, a king of Theſſaly ſon of Phlegias, or, according to Hyginus, of Leontes, or according to Diodorus, of Antion by Perimela daughter of Amythaon. He married Dia, daughter of Eioneus or Deioneus, and promiſed his father-in-law a valuable preſent for the choice he had made of him to be his daughter's huſband. His unwillingneſs, however, to fulfil his promiſes obliged Deioneus to have recourſe to violence to obtain it, and he ſtole away ſome of his horſes. Ixion concealed his reſentment under the maſk of friendſhip, he invited his father-in-law to a feaſt at Lariſſa, the capital of his kingdom, and when Deioneus was come according to the appointment, he threw him into a pit, which he had previously filled with wood and burning coals. This premeditated treachery so irritated the neighbouring princes that all of them refused to perform the usual ceremony, by which a man was then purified of murder, and Ixion was shunned and despised by all mankind. Jupiter had compassion upon him, and he carried him to heaven, and placed him at the tables of the gods. Such a favor which ought to have awakened gratitude in Ixion, served only to enflame his lust. He became enamoured of Juno, and attempted to seduce her. Juno was willing to gratify the passion of Ixion, or according to others she informed Jupiter of the attempts which had been made upon her virtue. Jupiter made a cloud in the shape of Juno, and carried it to the place where Ixion had appointed to meet Juno. Ixion was caught in the snares, and from his embrace with the cloud, he had the Centaurs, or according to others Centaurus, (Vid. Centauri.) Jupiter, displeased with the insolence of Ixion, banished him from heaven, but when he heard that he had the rashness to boast that he had seduced Juno, the god struck him with his thunder, and ordered Mercury to tie him to a wheel in hell, which continually whirls round. The wheel was perpetually in motion, therefore the punishment of Ixion was eternal. Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 62.—Pindar Pyth. 2.—Virg. G. 4, v. 484. Æn. 6, v. 601.—*Ovid. Labdăcus, a son of Polydorus by Nycteis, the daughter of Nycteus, king of Thebes. His father and mother died during his childhood, and he was left to the care of Nycteus who at his death left his kingdom in the hands of Lycus, with orders to restore it to Labdacus, as soon as of age. He was father to Laius. It is unknown whether he ever sat on the throne of Thebes. According to Statius his father's name was Phœnix. His descendants were called Labdacides. *Stat. The work is lost and only this curious line is preserved by an old scholiast Persius, 1, v. 4. Crudum pugnabunt Briamum, Priamique Pisinnes.

Labĕrius, J. Decimus, a Roman knight famous for his poetical talents in writing pantomimes. J. Cæsar compelled him to act one of his characters on the stage. The poet consented with great reluctance, but he shewed his resentment during the acting of the piece, by throwing severe aspersions upon J. Cæsar, and by warning the audience against his tyranny. Cæsar, however, restored him to the rank of knight, which he had lost by appearing on the stage, but to to his mortification when he went to take his ſeat among the knights, no one offered to make room for him, and even his friend Cicero ſaid, Recepiſſem te niſi anguſtè ſederem. Laberius was offended at the affectation and inſolence of Cicero, and reflected upon his unſettled and puſillanimous behaviour during the civil wars of Cæſar and Pompey, by the reply of Mirum ſi anguſtè ſedes, qui ſoles duabus ſellis ſedere. Laberius died ten months after the murder of J. LABRADĒUS, a ſirname of Jupiter in Caria. The word is derived from labrys, which in the language of the country ſignifies an hatchet, which Jupiter's ſtatue held in its hand. Plut.

LĂBYRINTHUS, a building whoſe numerous paſſages and perplexing windings render the way from it difficult, and almoſt impracticable. There were four very famous among the antients, one near the city of Crocodiles or Arſinoe, another in Crete, a third at Lemnos, and a fourth in Italy built by Porſenna. That of Egypt was the moſt antient, and Herodotus, who ſaw it, declares that the beauty and the art of the building were almoſt beyond belief. It was built by twelve kings who at one time reigned in Egypt, and it was intended for the place of their burial, and to commemorate the actions of their reign. It was divided into 12 halls, or according to Pliny, into 16, or as Strabo mentions, into 27. The halls were vaulted according to the relation of Herodotus. They had each ſix doors, opening to the north, and the ſame number to the ſouth, all ſurrounded by one wall. The edifice contained 3000 chambers, 1500 in the upper part, and the ſame number below. The chambers above were ſeen by Herodotus, and aſtoniſhed him beyond conception, but he was not permitted to ſee thoſe below, where were buried the holy crocodiles and the monarchs whoſe munificence had raiſed the edifice. The roofs and walls were incruſted with marble, and adorned with ſculptured figures. The halls were ſurrounded with ſtately and poliſhed pillars of white ſtone, and, according to ſome authors, the opening of the doors was artfully attended with a terrible noiſe like peals of thunder. The labyrinth of Crete was built by Dædalus, in imitation of that of Egypt, and it is the moſt famous of all in claſſical hiſtory. It was the place of confinement for Dædalus himſelf, and the priſon of the Minotaur. According to Pliny the labyrinth of Lemnos ſurpaſſed the others in grandeur and magnificence. It was ſupported by forty columns of uncommon height and thickneſs, and equally admirable for their beauty and ſplendor. Modern travellers are ſtill aſtoniſhed at the noble, and magnificent ruins which appear of the Egyptian labyrinth, at the ſouth of the lake Mœris, about 30 miles from the ruins of Arſinoe. Mela. 1, c. 9.—Plin. 36, c. 13.—Strab. 10.—Diod. 1.—Herodot. 2, c. 148. *Virg. LĂCÆNA, an epithet applied to a female native of Laconia, and, among others, to Helen.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 511.

LĂCĔDÆMON, a ſon of Jupiter and Taygeta the daughter of Atlas, who married Sparta the daughter of Eurotas by whom he had Amyclas and Eurydice the wife of Acriſius. He was the firſt who introduced the worſhip of the Graces in Laconia, and who built them a temple. From Lacedæmon and his wife, the capital of Laconia was called Lacedæmon and Sparta. Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Hygin. fab. 155—Pauſ. 3, c. 1.——A noble city of Peloponneſus, the capital of Laconia, called alſo Sparta, and now known by the name of Miſatra. It has been ſeverally known by the name of Lelegia, from the Leleges the firſt inhabitants of the country, or from Lelex one of their kings; and Œbalia from Œbalus the ſixth king from Eurotas. It was alſo called Hecatompolis from the hundred cities which the whole province once contained. Lelex is ſuppoſed to have been the firſt king. His deſcendants 13 in number, reigned ſucceſſively after him, till the reign of the ſons of Oreſtes, when the Heraclidæ recovered the Peloponneſus about 80 years after the Trojan war. C. 1102, their ſucceſſors in the family of Procles were called Proclidæ, and afterwards Eurypontidæ, and thoſe of Euryſthenes, Euryſthenidæ, and afterwards Agidæ. The ſucceſſors of Procles on the throne began to reign in the following order: Sous, 1060 B. C. after his father had reigned 42 years: Eurypon, 1028: Prytanis, 1021: Eunomus, 986: Polydectes, 907: Lycurgus, 898: Charilaus, 873: Nicander, 809: Theopompus, 770: Zeuxidamus, 723: Anaxidamus, 690: Archidamus, 631: Agaſicles, 605: Ariſton, 564: Demaratus, 526: Leotychides, 491: Archidamus, 496: Agis, 427: Ageſilaus, 397: Archidamus, 361: Agis 2d. 338: Eudamidas, 330: Archidamus, 295: Eudamidas 2d. 268: Agis, 244: Archidamus, 230: Eucleidas, 225: Lycurgus, 219:—The ſucceſſors of Euryſthenes were Agis, 1059: Echeſtratus, 1058: Labotas, 1023: Doryſſus, 986: Ageſilaus, 957: Archelaus, 913: Teleclus, 853: Alcamenes, 813: Polydorus, 776: Eurycrates, 724: Anaxander, 687: Eurycrates 2d. 644: Leon, 607: Anaxandrides, 563: Cleomenes, 530: Leonidas, 491: Pliſtarchus, under guardianſhip of Pauſanias, 480: Pliſtoanax, 466: Pauſanias, 408: Ageſipolis, 397: Cleombrotus, 380: Ageſipolis, 2d. 371: Cleomenes 2d. 370: Aretus or Areus, 309: Acrotatus, 265: Areus 2d. 264: Leonidas, 257: Cleombrotus, 243: Leonidas reſtored, 241: Cleomenes, 235: Ageſipolis, 219. Under the two laſt kings Lycurgus and Ageſipolis, the monarchical power was aboliſhed, though Machanidas the tyrant made himſelf abſolute, B. C. 210 and Nabis, 206, for 14 years. In the year 191, B. C. Lacedæmon joined the Achæan league, and about 3 years after the walls were demoliſhed by order of Philopœmen. The territories of Laconia ſhared the fate of the Achæan confederacy, and the whole was conquered by Mummius, 147 B. C. and converted into a Roman province. The inhabitants of Lacedæmon have rendered themſelves illuſtrious for their courage and intrepidity, for their love of honor and liberty, and for their averſion to ſloth and luxury. They were inured from their youth to labor, and their laws commanded them to make war their profeſſion. They never applied themſelves to any trade, but their only employment was arms, and they left every thing elſe to the care of their ſlaves. [Vid. Helotes.] They hardened their body by ſtripes and other manly exerciſes, and accuſtomed themſelves to undergo hardſhips, and even to die without fear or regret. From their valor in the field and their moderation and temperance at home, they were courted and revered by all the neighbouring princes, and their aſſiſtance was ſeverally implored to protect the Sicilians, Carthaginians, Thracians, Egyptians, Cyreneans, &c. They were forbidden by the laws of their country, [Vid. Lycurgus,] to viſit foreign countries, leſt their morals ſhould be corrupted by an intercourſe with effeminate nations. The auſtere manner in which their children were educated, rendered them undaunted in the field of battle, and from this circumſtance, Leonidas with a ſmall band was enabled to reſiſt the millions of the army of Xerxes at Thermopylæ. The women were as courageous as the men, and many a mother has celebrated with feſtivals the death of her ſon who had fallen in battle, or has coolly put him to death if by a ſhameful flight or loſs of his arms, he brought diſgrace upon his country. As to domeſtic manners the Lacedæmonians, as widely differed from their neighbours as in political concerns, and their nobleſt women were not aſhamed to appear on the ſtage hired for money. In the affairs of Greece, the intereſt of the Lacedæmonians was often powerful, and obtained the ſuperiority for 500 years. Their jealouſy of the power and greatneſs of the Athenians is well known. The authority of their monarchs was checked by the watchful eye of the Ephori who had the power of impriſoning the kings themſelves if guilty of miſdemeanors. [Vid. Ephori.] The Lacedæmonians are remarkable for the honor and reverence which they paid to old age. The names of Lacedæmon and Sparta, are promiſcuouſly applied to the capital of Laconia, and often confounded together. The latter was applied to the metropolis, and the former was reſerved for the inhabitants of the ſuburbs, or rather of the country contiguous to the walls of the city. This propriety of diſtinction was originally obſerved, but in proceſs of time it was totally loſt, and both appellatives were ſoon ſynonymous and indiſcriminately applied to the city and country. Lælia, a vestal virgin.

Lælianus, a general, proclaimed emperor in Gaul by his soldiers, A. D. 268, after the death of Gallienus. His triumph was short; he was conquered and put to death after a few months' reign by another general called Posthumus, who aspired to the imperial purple as well as himself.

C. Lælius, a Roman consul, A. U. C. 612, surnamed Sapiens, so intimate with Africanus the younger, that Cicero represents him in his treatise De Amicitiâ, as explaining the real nature of friendship, with its attendant pleasures. He made war with success against Viriathus. It is said, that he assisted Terence in the composition of his comedies. His modesty, humanity, and the manner in which he patronised letters deserve commendation. Cic. de Orat.——Another consul who accompanied Scipio Africanus the elder in his campaigns in Spain and Africa.——Archelaus, a famous grammarian. Suet.

Læna & Læmna, the mistress of Harmodius and Aristogiton. Being tortured because she refused to discover the conspirators, she bit off her tongue totally to frustrate the violent efforts of her executioners.——A man who was acquainted with the conspiracy formed against Cæsar.

Lænzus, a river of Crete.

Læpa Magna, a town of Spain. Mela. 3, c. 1.

Laërtes, a king of Ithaca, son of Arcesius and Chalcomedusa, who married Anticlea the daughter of Autolycus. Anticlea was pregnant by Sisyphus when she married Laertes, and eight months after her union with the king of Ithaca she brought forth a son called Ulysses. [Vid. Anticlea.] Ulysses was treated with paternal care by Laertes though not really his son, and Laertes ceded him his crown and retired into the country where he spent his time in gardening. He was found in this mean employment by his son at his return from the Trojan war, after 20 years' absence, and Ulysses, at the sight of his father whose dress and old age declared his sorrow, long hesitated whether he should suddenly introduce himself as his son, or whether he should, as a stranger, gradually awaken the paternal feelings of Laertes, who had believed that his son was no more. The last measure was preferred and when Laertes had burst into tears at the mention which was made of his son, Ulysses threw himself on his neck, exclaiming, "O father, I am he whom you weep." This welcome declaration was followed by a recital of all the hardships which Ulysses had suffered, and immediately after the father and son repaired to the palace of Penelope the wife of Ulysses, whence all the suitors who daily importuned the princess, were forcibly removed. Laertes was one of the Argonauts, according to Apollodorus, 1, c. 9.——Homer, Od. 11 & 24.——Ovid. Met. 13, v. 32. Hygin. 1. c. 98.——A city of Cilicia which gave birth to Diogenes, surnamed Laertius from the place of his birth.

Laertius Diogenes, a writer born at Laertes. Vid. Diogenes.

Læstrygones, the most antient inhabitants of Sicily. Some suppose them to be the same as the people of Leontium, and to have been neighbours to the Cyclops. They fed on human flesh, and when Ulysses came on their coasts, they sunk his ships and devoured his companions. [Vid. Antiphates.] They were of a gigantic stature, according to Homer's description. A colony of them, as some suppose, passed over into Italy, with Lamus at their head, where they built the town of Formiæ, whence the epithet of Læstrygonia is often used for that of Formiana. Plin. 3. c. 5.——Ovid. Met. 14, v. 233, &c. Fast. 4. ex Pont. 4. ep. 10.——Tzetz. in Lycophr. v. 662 & 818.——Hom. Od. 9. &c.

Læta, the wife of the emperor Gratian, celebrated for her humanity and generous sentiments.

Lætoria Lex ordered that proper persons should be appointed to provide for the security and the possessions of such as were insane, or squandered away their estates. It made it a high crime to abuse the weakness of persons under such circumstances. Cic. de Offic. 3.

Lætus, a Roman whom Commodus condemned to be put to death. This violence raised Lætus against Commodus; he conspired against him, and raised Pertinax to the throne.——A general of the emperor Severus, put to death for his treachery to the emperor; or, according to others, on account of his popularity.

Lævi, the antient inhabitants of Gallia Transpadana.

Lævinus, a Roman consul sent against Pyrrhus, A. U. C. 472. He informed the monarch that the Romans would not accept him as an arbitrator in the war with Tarentum, and feared him not as an enemy. He was defeated by Pyrrhus.——P. Val. a man despised at Rome, because he was distinguished by no good quality.——Horat. 1, Sat. 6, v. 12.

tion. He received in marriage Arsinoe the daughter of Meleager, who was then pregnant by king Philip, and being willing to hide the disgrace of his wife, he exposed the child in the woods. An eagle preserved the life of the infant, fed him with her prey, and sheltered him with her wings against the inclemency of the air. This uncommon preservation was divulged by Lagus, who adopted the child as his own and called him Ptolemy, conjecturing that as his life had been so miraculously preserved, his days would be spent in grandeur and affluence. This Ptolemy became king of Egypt after the death of Alexander. According to other accounts, Arsinoe was nearly related to Philip king of Macedonia, and her marriage with Lagus was not considered as dishonorable, because he was opulent and powerful. The first of the Ptolemies is called Lagus, to distinguish him from his successors of the same name. Ptolemy, the first of the Macedonian kings of Egypt, wished it to be believed that he was the legitimate son of Lagus, and he preferred the appellation of Lagides to all other appellations. It is even said, that he established a military order in Alexandria, which was called Lageion. The surname of Lagides was transmitted to all his descendants on the Egyptian throne till the reign of Cleopatra, Antony's mistress. Plutarch mentions an anecdote, which serves to shew how far the legitimacy of Ptolemy was believed in his age. A pedantic grammarian, says the historian, once displaying his great knowledge of antiquity in the presence of Ptolemy the king suddenly interrupted him with the question of, Pray tell me, Sir, who was the father of Peleus? Tell me, replied the grammarian without hesitation. tell me if you can, O king! Who the father of Lagus was? This reflection on the meanness of the monarch's birth did not in the least irritate his resentment, though the courtiers all glowed with indignation. Ptolemy praised the humor of the grammarian, and shewed his moderation and the mildness of his temper, by taking him under his patronage. *Paus. LAGYRA, a city of Taurica Chersonesus.

LAIAS, a king of Arcadia who succeeded his father Cypselus, &c. Paus. 8, c. 5.—A king of Elis, &c.

LAIS, a celebrated courtezan, daughter of Timandra the mistress of Alcibiades, born at Hyccara in Sicily. She was carried away from her native country into Greece, when Nicias the Athenian general invaded Sicily. She first began to sell her favors at Corinth for 10,000 drachmas, and the immense number of princes, noblemen, philosophers, orators and plebeians who courted her embraces, show how much commendation is owed to her personal charms. The expences which attended her pleasures, gave rise to the proverb of Non cuivis homini contingit adire Corinthum. Even Demosthenes himself visited Corinth for the sake of Lais, but when he was informed by the courtezan, that admittance to her bed was to be bought at the enormous sum of about 200l. English money, the orator departed, and observed, that he would not buy repentance at so dear a price. The charms which had attracted Demosthenes to Corinth, had no influence upon Xenocrates. When Lais saw the philosopher unmoved by her beauty, she visited his house herself; but there she had no reason to boast of the licentiousness or easy submission of Xenocrates. Diogenes the cynic was one of her warmest admirers, and though filthy in his dress and manners, yet he gained her heart and enjoyed her most unbounded favors. The sculptor Myron also solicited the favors of Lais, but he met with coldness: he, however, attributed the cause of his ill reception to the whiteness of his hair, and dyed it of a brown color, but to no purpose: Fool that thou art, said the courtezan, to ask what I refused yesterday to thy father. Lais ridiculed the austerity of philosophers, and laughed at the weakness of those who pretend to have gained a superiority over their passions, by observing that the sages and philosophers of the age were not above the rest of mankind, for she found them at her door as often as the rest of the Athenians. The success which her concubines met at Corinth encouraged Lais to pass into Thessaly, and more particularly to enjoy the company of a favorite youth called Hippostratus. She was, however, disappointed: the women of the place, jealous of her charms, and apprehensive of her corrupting the fidelity of their husbands, assassinated her in the temple of Venus, about 340 years before the Christian era. Some suppose that there were two persons of this name, a mother and her daughter. Cic. ad. Fam. 9, ep. 26.—Ovid. Amor. 1, el. 5.—Plut. in Alcib.—Paus. 2, c. 2.

LAIADES, a patronymic of Œdipus son of Laius.—Ovid. Met. 6, Fab. 18.

LAIUS, a son of Labdacus, who succeeded to the throne of Thebes, which his grandfather Nycteus had left to the care of his brother Lycus, till his grandſon came of age. He was driven from his kingdom by Amphion and Zethus, who were incenſed againſt Lycus for the indignities which Antiope had ſuffered. He was afterwards reſtored, and married Jocaſta the daughter of Creon. An oracle informed him that he ſhould perish by the hand of his ſon, and from this dreadful intelligence he reſolved never to approach his wife. A day ſpent in debauch and intoxication made him violate his vow, and Jocaſta brought forth a ſon. The child as ſoon as born was given to a ſervant, with orders to put him to death. The ſervant was moved with compaſſion, and only expoſed him on mount Cithæron, where his life was preſerved by a ſhepherd. The child called Œdipus was educated in the court of Polybus, and an unfortunate meeting with his father in a narrow road proved his ruin. Œdipus ordered his father to make way for him, without knowing who he was, Laius refuſed, and was inſtantly murdered by his irritated ſon. His arm-bearer or charioteer ſhared his fate. LAMIA & AUXESIA, two deities of Crete, whoſe worſhip was the ſame as at Eleuſis. The Epidaurians made them two ſtatues of an olive tree given them by the Athenians, provided they came to offer a ſacrifice to Minerva at Athens. Pauſ. 2, c. 30, &c.

LAMIACUM BELLUM happened after the death of Alexander, when the Greeks, and particularly the Athenians, incited by their orators, reſolved to free Greece from the garriſons of the Macedonians. Leoſthenes was appointed commander of a numerous force, and marched againſt Antipater, who then preſided over Macedonia. Antipater entered Theſſaly at the head of 13,000 foot and 600 horſe, and was beaten by the ſuperior force of the Athenians and of their Greek confederates. Antipater after this blow fled to Lamia, B. C. 323, where he reſolved, with all the courage and ſagacity of a careful general, to maintain a ſiege with about the 8 or 9000 men that had eſcaped from the field of battle. Leoſthenes, unable to take the city by ſtorm, began to make a regular ſiege. His operations were delayed by the frequent ſallies of Antipater, and Leoſthenes being killed by the blow of a ſtone which he received, Antipater made his eſcape out of Lamia, and ſoon after, with the aſſiſtance of the army of Craterus brought from Aſia, he gave the Athenians battle near Cranon, and though only 500 of their men were ſlain, yet they became ſo diſpirited, that they ſued for peace from the conqueror. Antipater at laſt with difficulty conſented, provided they raiſed taxes in the uſual manner, received a Macedonian garriſon, defrayed the expences of the war, and laſtly delivered into his hands Demoſthenes and Hyperides, the two orators whoſe prevailing eloquence had excited their countrymen againſt him. Theſe diſadvantageous terms were accepted by the Athenians, yet Demoſthenes had time to eſcape and poiſon himſelf. Hyperides was carried before Antipater, who ordered his tongue to be cut off, and afterwards to be put to death. Plut. in Demoſ.—Diod 17.—Juſtin. 11, &c.

LAMIÆ, ſmall iſlands before Troas. Plin. 5, c. 31.——Certain monſters of Afric, who had the face and breaſt of a woman, and the reſt of the body like that of a ſerpent. They allured ſtrangers to come to them, that they might devour them, and though they were not endowed with the faculty of ſpeech, yet their hiſſings were pleaſing and agreeable. Some believed them to be witches, or rather evil ſpirits, who, under the form of a beautiful woman, enticed young children and devoured them. According to ſome, the fable of the Lamiæ is derived from the amours of Jupiter with a certain beautiful woman called Lamia, whom the jealouſy of Juno rendered deformed, and whoſe children ſhe deſtroyed; upon which Lamia became inſane, and ſo deſperate that ſhe eat up all the children that came in her way. They are alſo called Lemures. [Vid. Lemures.] Philoſt. in Ap.

LAMPEDO, a woman of Lacedæmon, who was daughter, wife, sister, and mother of a king. She lived in the age of Alcibiades. Agrippina, the mother of Claudius, could boast the same honors. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 22 & 37.

LAMPETIA, a daughter of Apollo and Neæra. She with her sister Phaetusa guarded her father's flocks in Sicily when Ulysses arrived on the coasts of that island. These flocks were fourteen in number, seven herds of oxen and seven flocks of sheep, consisting each of fifty. They fed by night as well as by day, and it was deemed unlawful and sacrilegious to touch them. The companions of Ulysses, impelled by hunger, paid no regard to their sanctity, or to the threats and intreaties of their chief; but they carried away and killed some of the oxen. The watchful keepers complained to their father, and Jupiter, at the request of Apollo, punished the offence of the Greeks. The hides of the oxen appeared to walk, and the flesh which was roasting by the fire began to bellow, and nothing was heard but dreadful noises and loud lowings. The companions of Ulysses embarked on board their ships, but here the resentment of Jupiter followed them. A storm arose, and they all perished except Ulysses, who saved himself on the broken piece of a mast. Homer. Od. 12, v. 119.—Propert. 3, el. 12.——According to *Ovid. LAMPONIUS, an Athenian general, slain by his countrymen to attempt the conquest of Sicily.—Justin. 4, c. 3.

LAMPRIDIUS ÆLIUS, a Latin historian in the fourth century, who wrote the lives of some of the Roman emperors. His stile is inelegant, and his arrangement injudicious. His life of Commodus, Heliogabalus, Alexander, Severus, &c. is still extant, and to be found in the works of the Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores.

LAMPRUS, a celebrated musician, &c.—C. Nep. in Epam.

LAMPSACUS & LAMPSACUM, a town of Asia minor on the borders of the Propontis at the north of Abydos. Priapus was the chief deity of the place, of which he was reckoned by some the founder. His temple there was the asylum of lewdness and debauchery, and exhibited scenes of the most unnatural lust. Alexander resolved to destroy the city on account of the vices of its inhabitants, or more probably for its firm adherence to the interest of Persia. It was, however, saved from ruin by the artifice of Anaximenes (Vid. Anaximenes.) It was formerly called Pityusa, and received the name of Lampsacus, from Lampsaces, a daughter of Mandron, a king of Phrygia, who gave information to some Phocæans who dwelt there, that the rest of the inhabitants had conspired against their life. This timely information saved them from destruction. The city afterwards bore the name of their preserver. Mela. 1. c. 19.—Strab. 13.—Paus. 9, c. 31. Herodot. 5, c. 117.—C. Nep. in Themist. c. 10.

LAMPTERIA, a festival at Pellene in Achaia, in honor of Bacchus who was surnamed Lampter from λαμπειν, to shine, because during this solemnity, which was observed in the night the worshippers went to the temple of Bacchus, with lighted torches in their hands. It was also customary to place vessels full of wine in several parts of every street in the city. Paus. 4, c. 21.

LAMPUS, a son of Ægyptus.——A man of Elis.——A son of Protaus.

LAMUS, a king of the Læstrygones, who is supposed by some to have founded Formiæ in Italy. The family of the Lamiæ at Rome was, according to the opinion of some, descended from him. Horat. 3. od, 17.——A son of Hercules and Omphale, who succeeded his mother on the throne of Lydia. Ovid. Heroid. 9.——A Latian chief killed by Nisus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 334.——A river of Bœotia. Paus.

9, c. 32.——A Spartan general hired by Nectanebus king of Egypt. Diod. 16.——A city of Cilicia.——A town near Formiæ, built by the Læstrygones.

LĂMȳRUS, bleſſon, a ſirname of one of the Ptolemies.——One of the auxiliaries of Turnus, killed by Niſus.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 334.

LANASSA, a daughter of Cleodæus, who married Pyrrhus, the ſon of Achilles, by whom ſhe had eight children. Plut. in Pyrr.—Juſtin. 17, c. 3.——A daughter of Agathocles, who married Pyrrhus, whom ſhe ſoon after forſook for Demetrius. Plut.

LANCEA, a ſcuntain, &c. Pauſ.

LANCIA, a town of Luſitania. Flor. 4, c. 12.

LANDIA, a people of Germany, conquered by Cæſar.

LANGIA, a river of Peloponneſus, falling into the bay of Corinth.

LANGOBARDI, a ſavage nation of Germany. Tacit. An. 2, c. 45.

LĂNŪVIUM, a town of Latium, about 16 miles from Rome on the Appian road. Juno had there a celebrated temple which was frequented by the inhabitants of Italy, and particularly by the Romans whoſe conſuls on firſt entering upon office offered ſacrifices to the goddeſs. The ſtatue of the goddeſs was covered with a goat's ſkin, and armed with a buckler and ſpear, and wore ſhoes which were turned upwards in the form of a cone. Cic. pro. Mur. de Nat. D. 1, c. 29.—Liv. 8, c. 14.—Ital. 13, v. 364.

LAOBŌTAS or LĂBOTAS, a Spartan king, of the family of the Agidæ, who ſucceeded his father Echeſtratus, B. C. 1023. During his reign war was declared againſt Argos, by Sparta. He ſat on the throne for 37 years, and was ſucceeded by Doryſſus his ſon. Pauſ. 3, c. 2.

LĂŎCOON, a ſon of Priam and Hecuba, or according to others of Antenor or of Capys. As being prieſt of Apollo, he was commiſſioned by the Trojans to offer a bullock to Neptune to render him propitious. During the ſacrifice two enormous ſerpents, iſſued from the ſea, and attacked Laocoon's two ſons who ſtood next to the altar. The father immediately attempted to defend his ſons, but the ſerpents falling upon him ſqueezed him in their complicated wreathes, and he died in the greateſt agonies. This puniſhment was inflicted upon him for his temerity in diſſuading the Trojans to bring into the city the fatal wooden horſe which the Greeks had conſecrated to Minerva, as alſo for his impiety in hurling a javelin againſt the ſides of the horſe as it entered within the walls. Hyginus attributes this to his marriage againſt the conſent of Apollo, or according to others, for his polluting the temple, by his commerce with his wife Antiope, before the ſtatue of the god. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 41, & 201.—Higin. fab. 135.

LAODĂMAS, a ſon of Alcinous, king of the Phæacians, who offered to wreſtle with Ulyſſes, while at his father's court. Ulyſſes mindful of the hoſpitality of Alcinous, refuſed the challenge of Laodamas. Homer. od. 7.——A ſon of Eteocles, king of Thebes, Pauſ. 9, c. 15.

LAŎDĂMIA, a daughter of Acaſtus and Aſtydamia, who married Proteſilaus, the ſon of Iphiclus king of a part of Theſſaly. The departure of her huſband for the Trojan war was the ſource of grief to her, but when ſhe heard that he had fallen by the hand of Hector her ſorrow was encreaſed. To keep alive the memory of a huſband whom ſhe had tenderly loved, ſhe ordered a wooden ſtatue to be made and regularly placed in her bed. This was ſeen by one of her ſervants, who informed Iphiclus, that his daughter's bed was daily defiled by an unknown ſtranger. Iphiclus watched his daughter, and when he found that the intelligence was falſe, he ordered the wooden image to be burned in hopes of diſſipating his daughter's grief. He did not ſucceed. Laodamia threw herſelf into the flames with the image, and periſhed. This circumſtance has given occaſion to fabulous traditions related by the poets, which mention, that Proteſilaus was reſtored to life, and to Laodamia for three hours, and that when he was obliged to return to the infernal regions, he perſuaded his wife to accompany him. Virgil. Æn. 6, v. 447.—Ovid. Her. ep. 13. Hygin. fab. 104.——A daughter of Bellerophon by Achemone the daughter of king Iobates. She had a ſon by Jupiter, called Sarpedon. She dedicated herſelf to the ſervice of Diana, and hunted with her, but her haughtineſs proved fatal to her, and ſhe periſhed by the arrows of Diana. Homer. Il. 6, 12, & 16.——A daughter of Alexander, king of Epirus by Olympia the daughter of Pyrrhus. She was aſſaſſinated in the temple of Diana, where ſhe had fled for ſafety during a ſedition. Her murderer called Milo, ſoon after turned his dagger againſt his own breaſt and killed himſelf. Juſtin. 28, c. 3.

LAŎNICE, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba, who became enamoured of Acamas, ſon of Theſeus, when he came with Diomedes, from the Greeks to Troy with an embaſſy to demand the reſtoration of Helen. She obtained an interview and the gratification of her deſires at the houſe of Philebia the wife of a governor of a ſmall town of Troas which the Greek ambaſſadors had viſited. She had a ſon by Acamas, whom ſhe called Munitus. She afterwards married Helicaon ſon of Antenor, and Telephus king of Myſia. Some call her Aſtyoche. According to the Greek ſcholiaſt of Lycophron, Laodice threw herſelf down from the top of a tower and was killed when Troy was ſacked by the Greeks. Dictys Cret. 1.—Pauſ. 13, c. 26.—Homer. Il. 3. & 6.——One of the Oceanides.——A daughter of Cinyras, by whom Elatus had ſome children. Apollod. 3, c. 14.——A daughter of Agamemnon, called alſo Electra. Homer. Il. 9.——A ſiſter of Mithridates who married Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, and afterwards her own brother Mithridates. During the ſecret abſence of Mithridates, ſhe proſtituted herſelf to her ſervants, in hopes that her huſband was dead, but when ſhe ſaw her expectations fruſtrated, ſhe attempted to poiſon Mithridates, for which ſhe was put to death.——A queen of Cappadocia, put to death by her ſubjects for poiſoning five of her children.——A ſiſter and wife of Antiochus 2d. She put to death Berenice, whom her huſband had married. [Vid. Antiochus 2d.] She was murdered by order of Ptolemy Evergetes, B. C. 246.——A daughter of Demetrius ſhamefully put to death by Ammonius the tyrannical miniſter of the vicious Alexander Bala, king of Syria.——A daughter of Seleucus.——The mother of Seleucus. Nine months before ſhe brought forth ſhe dreamt that Apollo had introduced himſelf into her bed, and had preſented her with a precious ſtone, on which was engraved the figure of an anchor, commanding her to deliver it to her ſon as ſoon as born. This dream appeared the more wonderful when in the morning ſhe diſcovered in her bed a ring anſwering the ſame deſcription. Not only the ſon that ſhe brought forth called Seleucus, but alſo all his ſucceſſors of the houſe of the Seleucidæ, had the mark of an anchor upon their thigh. Juſtin.—Appian in Syr. mentions this anchor, though in a different manner.

LAODICEA, a city of Aſia, on the borders of Caria, Phrygia, and Lydia, celebrated for its commerce and the fine wool of its ſheep. It was originally called Dioſpolis, and afterward Rhoas; and received the name of Laodicea in honor of Laodice, the wife of Antiochus. Strab. 12.—Mela. 1, c. 12. Cic. pro Flacc.——Another in Media deſtroyed by an earthquake in the age of Nero.——Another in Syria called, by way of diſtinction Laodicea Cabioſa, or ad Libanum.——Another on the borders of Cœleſyria Strab.

LAODICENE, a province of Syria, which receives its name from Laodicea, its capital.

LAODOCHUS, a ſon of Antenor, whoſe form Minerva borrowed to adviſe Pandarus to break the treaty which ſubſiſted between the Greeks and Trojans. Homer. Il. 4.——An attendant of Antiochus.——A ſon of Priam. Apollod. 3, c. 12.——A ſon of Apollo and Phtia. Id. 1, c. 7.

LAOGONUS, a ſon of Bias, brother to Dardanus. Homer. Il.——A prieſt of Jupiter, killed by Merion in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 16.

LAOGORAS, a king of the Dryopes, who accuſtomed his ſubjects to become robbers. He plundered the temple of Apollo at Delphi, and was killed by Hercules. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

LAOGORE, a daughter of Cinyras and Metharme, daughter of Pygmalion. She died in Eygpt. Id. 3, c 14.

LAOMEDON, ſon of Ilus king of Troy, married Strymo, called by ſome Placia, or Leucippe, by whom he had Podarces, afterwards known by the name of Priam, and Heſione. He built the walls of Troy, and was aſſiſted by Apollo and Neptune, whom Jupiter had baniſhed from heaven, and condemned to be ſubſervient to the will of Laomedon for one year. When the walls were finiſhed Laomedon refuſed to reward the labors of the gods, and ſoon after his territories were laid waſte by the ſea or Neptune, and his ſubjects were viſited by a peſtilence ſent by Apollo. Sacrifices were offered to the offended divinities, but the calamities of the Trojans encreaſed, and nothing could appeaſe the gods, according to the words of the oracle, but annually to expoſe to a ſea monſter a Trojan virgin. Whenever the monſter appeared, the marriageable maidens were aſſembled, and the lot decided which of them was doomed to death for the good of her country. When this calamity had continued for five or ſix years, the lot fell upon Heſione, Laomedon's daughter. The king was unwilling to part with a daughter whom he loved with uncommon tenderneſs, but his refuſal would irritate more ſtrongly the wrath of the gods. In the midſt of his fears and heſitation, Hercules came and offered to deliver the Trojans from this public calamity, if Laomedon promiſed to reward him with a number of fine horſes. The king conſented, but when the monſter was deſtroyed, he refuſed to fulfil his engagements and Hercules was obliged to beſiege Troy and take it by force of arms. Laomedon was put to death after a reign of 29 years, his daughter Heſione was given in marriage to Telamon, one of the conqueror's attendants, and Podarces was ranſomed by the Trojans and placed upon his father's throne. According to Hyginus, the wrath of Neptune and Apollo was kindled againſt Laomedon becauſe he refuſed to offer on their altars, as a ſacrifice, all the firſt born of his cattle, according to a vow he had made. Homer. Il. 21.—Virg. Æn. 2 & 9.—Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 6.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Pauſ. 7. c. 20.—Horat. 3, od. 3.—Hygin. 89.——A demagogue of Meſſana in Sicily.—A ſatrap of Phœnicia, &c. Curt. 10 c. 10.——An Athenian, &c. Plut.——An Orchomenian. Id.

LAŎMĔDONTĔUS, an epithet applied to the Trojans from their king Laomedon. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 542.

LAŎMĔDONTIĂDÆ, a patronymic given to the Trojans from Laomedon their king. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 248.

LAONŎME, the wife of Polyphemus one of the Argonauts.

LAŎTHOE, a daughter of Altes, a king of the Leleges, who married Priam, and became mother of Lycaon and Polydorus. Homer. Il. 21.——One of the daughters of Theſpius, mother of Antidus, by Hercules. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

LAOUS, a river of Lacedæmon.

LAPĂTHUS, a city of Cyprus.

LAPHRIA, a ſirname of Diana at Patræ in Achaia, where ſhe had a temple with a ſtatue of gold and ivory which repreſented her in the habit of a huntreſs. This name was given to the goddeſs from Laphrius, the ſon of Delphus, who conſecrated the ſtatue to her. There was a feſtival of the goddeſs there, called alſo Laphria, of which Pauſ. 7, c. 18, gives an account.

LAPHYSTIUM, a mountain in Bœotia, where Jupiter had a temple, whence he was called Laphyſtius. It was here that Athamas prepared to immolate Phryxus and Helle, whom Jupiter ſaved by ſending them a golden ram. Pauſ. 9, c. 34.

LAPIDEUS, a ſirname of Jupiter among the Romans.

LĂPĪTHÆ, a people of Theſſaly. Vid. Lapithus.

LAPĪTHO, a city of Cyprus.

LĂPĪTHUS, a ſon of Apollo, by Stilbe. He was brother to Centaurus, and married Orſinome, daughter of Euronymus, by whom he had Phorbas and Periphas. The name of Lapithæ was given to the numerous children of Phorbas and Periphas, or rather to the inhabitants of the country of which they had obtained the ſovereignty. The chief of the Lapithæ aſſembled to celebrate the nuptials of Pirithous, one of their number, and among them were Theſeus, Dryas, Hopleus, Mopſus, Phalerus, Exadius, Prolochus, Titareſius, &c. The Centaurs were alſo invited to partake the common feſtivity, and the amuſements would have been harmleſs and innocent, had not one of the intoxicated Centaurs offered violence to Hippodamia, the wife of Pirithous. The Lapithæ reſented the injury, and the Centaurs ſupported their companions, upon which the quarrel became univerſal, and ended in blows and ſlaughter. Many of the Centaurs were ſlain, and they at laſt were obliged to retire. Theſeus among the Lapithæ, ſhewed himſelf brave and intrepid in ſupporting the cauſe of his friends, and Neſſus alſo was not leſs active in the protection of chaſtity and innocence. This quarrel aroſe from the reſentment of Mars, whom Pirithous forgot or neglected to invite among the other gods, at the celebration of his nuptials, and therefore the divinity puniſhed the inſult by ſowing diſſenſion among the feſtive aſſembly. [Vid. Centauri.] Heſiod has deſcribed the battle of the Centaurs and Lapithæ, as alſo Ovid, in a more copious manner. The invention of bits and bridles for horſes is attributed to the Lapithæ. Virg. G. 3, v. 115. Æn. 6, v. 601.—l. 7, v. 305.—Ovid. Met. 12.—Heſiod. in Scut.—Diod. 4.—Pind. 2 Pyth.—Strab. 9.—Stat. Theb. 7, v. 304.

LAPITHÆUM, a town of Arcadia. Paſ. 3, c. 20.

LARA or LARANDA, one of the Naiads daughter of the river Almon in Latium, famous for her beauty and her loquacity, which her parents long endeavoured to correct, but in vain. She revealed to Juno the amours of her huſband Jupiter with Juturna, for which the god cut off her tongue, and ordered Mercury to conduct her to the infernal regions. The meſſenger of the gods fell in love with her by the way, and gratified his paſſion. Lara became mother of two children, to whom the Romans have paid divine honors according to the opinion of ſome, under the name of Lares. Ovid. Faſt. 2, v. 599.

LARENTIA & LAURENTIA, a courteſan in the firſt ages of Rome. Vid Acca.
